POLLY VIRGINIA.—We do not think it necessary for you to procure your marriage license in the county where you reside, but we think the ceremony should be performed in the county where the license is procured.

MRS. J. G. E., Louisiana.—Under the laws of Texas, we are of the opinion that five years' peaceable possession of real estate, cultivating, using and enjoying the same, paying taxes thereon, and claiming under deed duly registered, and which is neither forged nor executed under a forged power of attorney, gives full title, and that 10 years' like peaceable possession, cultivation and enjoyment, without evidence of title, gives to the possessor full title to one hundred and sixty acres, and to all beyond which he has in actual possession, provided the statute of limitations is placed in any action brought for the recovery of such land.

MISS M. R., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the child you mention was legally adopted under the proper judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, such child would have intestacy inheritance rights in the foster parents' estate.

MRS. B. H., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention was in the husband's name, upon the wife's death before the death of her husband, her children would not inherit any interest in the property, which would remain, as before, the property of the husband, as it would have been necessary for the wife to have survived the husband in order to acquire an interest in his property that would go to her children upon her death; but if the property you mention belonged to the wife, upon her death, without a will, her children would be entitled to their share of the property.

S. R. J., South Carolina.—We think that witnesses are necessary for a marriage ceremony, but in case you cannot provide your own witnesses, perhaps the minister or other official who performs the ceremony will provide them.

MRS. J. M. C., California.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of the husband one-half of the community property goes to the wife and the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband, and in the absence of such disposition goes to his descendants; we think the money turned over to your father by your mother would be his separate property and upon his death would be subject to his testamentary disposition, and in the absence of this would be administered as his separate property, being divided among his present wife, if she survives, and the children of both marriages in shares depending upon who is left.

MRS. P. E. F., Oklahoma.—If, as we understand from your communication, your grandfather abandoned the land he owned in Kentucky over fifty years ago, we do not think your mother now has any chance of recovering any portion of this property.

C. W. M., Texas.—After neglecting to prosecute your claim against your brother's widow for a period of thirty years, we do not think you would succeed in an action against her estate to set aside the deeds you mention.

MRS. J. R. M., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of Missouri, we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations runs against actions for ejectment from real estate within ten years, but that the statute must be plead as a defense in any action where it is relied upon as a defense.

W. B., Tennessee.—In order to create a tenancy by the entirety in real estate, the deed should run to the husband and wife, naming both and reciting them as husband and wife. We think that property deeded to the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety upon the death of one becomes the sole property of the survivor.

M. D., Minnesota.—If both the local assessor, and the board of tax appeals have assessed your property in Montana in excess of its true value or at a value out of proportion of the assessments of other property in the locality where your property is situated, we think it will be necessary for you to bring a court proceeding to have the assessment reviewed; we think such proceedings should be brought before the assessment is confirmed.

R. A. B., New Jersey.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, the whole of her personal estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to her surviving husband.

MRS. E. G., Oklahoma.—If the woman who employed your daughter refuses to pay her for the services performed, we think it will be necessary for your daughter to bring an action against this woman to enforce her rights.

S. H., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a will must be signed by the testator, or by some person in his or her presence and by his or her direction, and attested in his or her presence at his or her request by at least two witnesses.

MRS. M. J. M., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a widow may dissent from her husband's will and take what the law would give her in case of intestacy, consisting of dower in his real estate and a share of his personal estate depending upon who he left as his other heirs of law and next of kin; we think that during the marriage and subject to a limitation relating to contracts between husband and wife, a married woman may contract and deal so as to affect her real and personal property with same effect as if she were unmarried, but she cannot convey her real estate without written consent of husband. We think if you can substantiate by the proper evidence that your husband gave you the property you mention, you are entitled to keep same.

MRS. J. H., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, the whole of his personal estate would go to his surviving widow, subject to payment of debts and expenses.

P. J. R., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the merchant you mention is legally entitled to recover the amount of the debt owed him by the man you mention with interest thereon less the amount of the payments already made him.

R. S., Indiana.—We think the courts of your state leave power to refuse the appointment of one of the favored classes for administrator of a decedent's estate in case such candidate for appointment is not properly qualified for such appointment, and that your courts also have power to remove an administrator in case he is dishonest or not properly qualified for such office.

MRS. L. T. M., Idaho.—If your neighbor allows his cattle to trespass upon your property after notice to him to keep them confined, we think you are entitled to collect from him such damages as you have suffered by reason thereof in the proper action brought for the enforcement of your rights.

How My Wife Learned to Play the Piano in 90 Days

A husband's story of the fulfillment of a life-long wish—by a new, easy, spare-time method which has brought the joy of music into thousands of silent homes.

FROM boyhood, I vowed that if ever I had a home of my own there would be music in it. No wife for me unless she could play some instrument, and play it well.

But one day Beth came along, knowing not one note from another, and Beth is Mrs. Taylor today. A piano graced our new home, but somehow the old vow was forgotten, and stayed forgotten until Jimmy Jr., and Beth No. 2 were quite some youngsters.

Then along about the time the novelty of parenthood began to wear off a bit, the yearning for music came back. And one evening I spoke out, "Beth, I'd give a hundred dollars if you could play something—piano, violin, banjo, ukulele—anything." Beth looked so hurt I was ashamed of myself, so I said no more.

About three months later I got home early one night, and heard the old piano come to life—first a little jazzy piece, then a sweet plantation melody. And there at the piano was Beth, playing, and the two kiddies beating time! She saw me, and stopped. "Oh," she cried, "I'm so sorry!" "Believe me, I'm not," I shouted, and I grabbed the whole family up in my arms.

"But, Jim, I wanted to wait and surprise you when I could really play. I'm learning fast, but it's only three months since I found out"—"Found out what?" I said. Beth began to cry. "I know!" Jimmy, Jr. piped up, "Mother found out the way to learn music just like I am learning to read in school—only lots easier."

Well, that musical party lasted all the evening. It was a howling success.

Jimmy Jr. had told the truth; the method Beth had found was so easy that anyone at all, from 8 years up, could learn it. By this method the U. S. School of Music, the largest in the world, has already trained over 300,000 people, teaching the playing of any musical instrument almost in the same way a school-child learns to read.

When first learning to read you look at every letter separately, and spell out every word, c-a-t, m-a-n. Later you do not see the letters; you see the words as units, "cat," "man." By and by longer words become units to you, and you find that whole expressions, like "up the steps," "on the train," no longer are seen as separate words, but immediately, at one instant, without spelling, without thinking words, you see each expression in the unit form.

The alphabet of music follows the alphabet of language. Each note is a letter, and playing is practically spelling the notes together correctly. The first note on the staff above is F. Whether you sing or play, it is always F. The four notes shown above are F-A-C-E, easy to remember because they spell "face." Certain strings on mandolin, certain keys on piano, certain parts of all instruments, are these same notes. Once you learn them, playing melodies is a matter of acting what you see! You play almost before you realize it—and every step is real fun, fascinating, simple, interesting, almost too good to be true.

Remember, neither my wife nor most of the 300,000 other musicians trained by this method knew anything about music. Beth mastered the piano; she could just as easily have mastered anything else. Jimmy, Jr., is now taking up violin, and my daughter is learning singing. Right at home, no costly teacher, no classes at inconvenient hours, no useless study and practice. No numbers, no tricks, no makeshifts. But a sound, quick musical education, learning by notes. Anyone can learn any instrument or sing this way.

When I told Beth I was writing this out to put in a magazine, she told me to be sure and say that the school will gladly send a free book explaining everything, called "Music Lessons in Your Own Home," and that right now there is a special short-time Reduced Price Offer being made to music lovers. The book is free, asking for it obligates you not at all—but you should send for it right away before all copies are gone.

JAMES W. TAYLOR.

Mr. Taylor is enthusiastic. He has a right to be. Yet when you read the facts in our free book you will appreciate that his opinion is conservative. You, too, can easily learn your favorite instrument or to sing.

dye on his whiskers. Anyway, years are only funny things that calendars establish and family Bibles record. For of course we are just as old as our hearts, and it is only ourselves who keep these records or compile individual almanacs. Some day, through wise analysis, a wily chemist will find out that love and laughter are the chief ingredients in the waters of the Fountain of Youth. And then the International Longevity Corporation will be established to sell love and laughter out of a bottle at so much a quart. But you and I and many others, Mrs. Lottie, will still be able, I trust, to manufacture our own Love Homebrew—and we will smile as we quaff and watch the years go by and the calendar makers suffer.

ERIE HEIGHTS, KENTUCKY.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Won't you please let me in? I have been knocking so long I am almost frozen this cold morning. I live in the Cumberlands of Kentucky where we are supposed to pack guns and drink white lightning, but we are, as a rule, peace-loving citizens just like other folks. Of course, there are some outlaws and roughnecks here, the same as there are in New York and Brooklyn, or any of the large cities.

Well, Uncle Lisha, I wish you could have seen our mountains in all autumnal beauty. After the summer is gone and the days grow cold, they put on their dresses of red and gold. If there is any choice for beauty between spring and fall, I think I prefer the fall. I am a great lover of nature. I don't think man has ever invented anything that can compare with the beauties of nature. This is truly God's country. I sure do pity the poor folks that have to live cooped up in the city with never a breath of pure fresh air. My home is on a hilltop where I can see the sunrise as well as the sunset. I often wish I was a great painter so that I could paint some of the beauties of my mountain home, but, alas, I have had no opportunity to study painting.

We have a great many flowers that grow wild and bloom from early spring until frost. There are some still in bloom. All of us live the free outdoor life and are happy, contented and unusually strong and robust. We women often work in the fields and are not ashamed to be called clodhoppers or "briar-jumpers" as some people call us.

Uncle Charlie was one of my heroes and I am a true-blue American.

Lovingly your niece, ROSE WINTERS.

You don't know how pleased I always am, Rose, when I get a letter from one of the Family who is sincerely in love with the country which lies about his or her home—and also with the life that can be lived in such beloved surroundings. I get many letters from cousins who long for a city life. They do not know that the woods and fields about them are really the truest and best city of God that offers pleasures no man-built, men-filled hive of a town can give. Each year city dwellers need more and more to be pitied as you do pity them, Rose. Crowds increase, rents increase, prices of food increase, bad odors and bad air increase, and, worse than all else, each year in our congested towns increase the lies of trade, the untruths of action, and the inhumanity and exploitation that must always occur where men are packed so closely and must live upon one another's losses and gains. In the largest of our cities man has not literally room to live or breathe. By day there is little of sunlight or of green things for him to rest his tired eyes upon, and by night even the greatest of the stars are not to be seen in the floods of artificial lights beckoning to artificial pleasures. Sidewalk-tethered and wall-prisoned he lives and dies—poor civilization's alien in a country like ours which offers so much of Nature's beauty and great spaces. Almost six millions of such unfortunates make up the population of New York. And in the state of Wyoming, for instance, there are over eighteen million acres of vacant public land.

Indeed I wish I might have seen your mountains last autumn, Rose. The Psalmist was right when he wrote of the help that comes from the hills. A high country breeds high thoughts. The strength and peace of mountains are always ours

26-Piece Table Set

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a reward for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 7625.

54 Inch Rope Of Pearls

Reward No. 9882

Full Opera Length

THE dream of every woman and girl is to possess her own necklace of gleaming, iridescent pearls. There's a wonderful fascination about them—a beauty that appeals to every feminine heart.

Now your dream can come true—for we are giving away this handsome, full opera length rope of Parisian pearls. It is 54 inches long, all the pearls are of uniform size—¼ inch in diameter—of perfect finish and luster, far handsomer than the ordinary imitation pearl necklace sold at a high price. It can easily be wound twice around the neck, making the double rope as shown in our illustration.

By rare good luck we secured first choice of these necklaces from a large importer and at a price that enables us to give them for an unusually small club. Please read the following offer and learn how you can get a beautiful, 54-inch rope of pearls free of all cost.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this handsome, opera length Pearl Necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9882.

She Is Looking For A Mother

"Peggy" The New Winter Doll

Do You Want Her?

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives so long as as it is in some cozy little town or on a nice, big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.

Peggy says that life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

Beautify Your Home With These Magnificent Ever-Blooming Roses!

THERE'S no place like home—and no home as beautiful in summer as when surrounded with fragrant, luxuriously blooming roses. Why not plant some around your home this spring? Even if you now have a garden, you can find room for the five splendid bushes offered here—and they will cost you nothing. We buy these roses from the largest rose growers in the world. They are the finest that can be obtained. There are five different varieties in the assortment and each is absolutely the prize of its class, producing every month in the season an amazing profusion of large, magnificent blossoms, delightful in fragrance and of the most radiant colors. The bushes are one year old, strong, healthy, with well-formed roots. No matter where you live you will receive them at the proper time to plant in your locality. We guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. If they do not, or if any of the bushes fail to grow, we will replace them free of all cost. Following is a brief description of each of the five varieties given you on this offer. And please remember that with the bushes we are also going to send you complete directions for their planting and culture.

You Get One Each Of These Five Prize Beauties!

Mrs. Charles Bell One of the most beautiful and fragrant shell-pink roses ever introduced. It is a strong, vigorous grower and one of the hardiest of all bloomers. The flowers are faultlessly formed, extra large and double, and the abundance of bloom produced in one season is simply astounding.

Etoile De Lyon This magnificent bright sulphur-yellow rose is a fine forcer and an ideal variety both for cutting and garden purposes, being an exceptionally vigorous grower and prolific bloomer, bearing its flowers on strong, erect stems well covered with dark, glossy foliage.

W. C. Gaunt A rose of unusual individuality. Its color is a brilliant, velvety vermillion tipped with scarlet. The buds are medium long and pointed, the stems rigid, habit branching, with large, oval beech-green foliage. The fragrance of this rose is like tea and it is a rapid, vigorous grower.

Climbing Helen Gould There is probably no red rose so popular as the beautiful Helen Gould. It is now introduced for the first time in climbing form. Everybody is familiar with the warm watermelon-red color of its charming flowers. This is a grand climber, having none of the defects of the older varieties.

Snowflake A crowning masterpiece, with hardy, vigorous constitution, growing to perfection in almost any soil or situation. It has the most magnificent foliage and is a continuous bloomer of medium-size flowers, the beauty of which is nothing short of superb. Its color is pure white.

Our Free Offer For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you the above described five rose bushes (one each of the five varieties) free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8661. They will be mailed to you at the proper time for planting in your locality.

This Beautiful Crystal Necklace

Topaz Amethyst Emerald Sapphire

For A Club Of Only Two!

RIGHT from New York, the center of fashion, comes this new, stylish necklace and we were indeed fortunate in obtaining a good supply of them. We only wish we could show it in its actual colors because mere words fail to do it justice. It is thirty inches long, composed of brilliant crystal cut beads, alternating with seed beads, with transparent long oval and round bead ornamentations and tassel. It comes in four different colors—Topaz, Amethyst, Emerald and Sapphire.

City people of course have no difficulty in obtaining the newest styles in necklaces. But COMFORT'S women and girl readers live in the country, far from the up-to-date stores—and that's why we make this offer. This is your opportunity to secure a necklace as handsome and stylish as any that will be seen anywhere this season. And best of all, it will not cost you one cent if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this beautiful crystal bead necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Reward No. 1142.

Writing And Drawing Outfit

Reward No. 9972

For Home And School

HERE is something that is needed in every home and by every schoolboy and schoolgirl—a big value-assortment of almost everything needed for writing and drawing. Our illustration is, of course, greatly reduced in size. The Case, which is made of fine leatherette, is 10½ inches long and 2½ inches wide. It is of the folding style, with a snap fastener, so that it can conveniently be carried in the pocket or in the children's lunch basket. Inside the Case there are three high-grade pencils with erasers, one good quality penholder with pen, one twin pencil (in reality two pencils in a combination holder), one pencil sharpener, one large rubber eraser, one 10-inch ruler and an aluminum collapsible drinking cup with cover.

This Outfit is manufactured by the American Lead Pencil Company, which is sufficient guarantee of its fine quality, and we know that it will please our readers, especially those who have children going to school, and of course it is just as handy in the home, because all the pencils, penholder, etc., are high grade and just what grown people like to use. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these fine Outfits free.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this complete Writing and Drawing Outfit, exactly as above described, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9972.

The Film-O-Scope

With 125 Moving Picture Views

Almost As Good As A Movie Show

HERE is something as good as a movie show for the children the year round—the wonderful new Film-O-Scope with a powerful magnifying lens—and with it we give you free a big collection of 125 Views from real moving picture films. These views, when looked at through the Scope, are magnified many times and stand out as real and life-like as they appear on the screen in regular moving picture theaters. Leading movie "stars" and scenes from their best pictures are included in the collection and there are no two alike. As one view after another is placed in the Scope and seen through the magnifying lens, one experiences about the same pleasure as that derived from a regular movie show and as the pictures may be repeated as often as desired, they furnish a never-ending, joyful entertainment for the young folks, keeping them amused, instructed, and out of mischief indoors.

Boys and girls in the cities are delighted with this new Film-O-Scope and the wonderful collection of 125 entertaining and exciting views that come with it, so we have purchased a supply of them to give away to COMFORT'S boys and girls who live in the country and small towns where the Scope is not being sold. You can have one of them absolutely free by accepting the following special offer:

Given To You! For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you the Film-O-Scope with 125 Moving Picture Views free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8741.

When Is Your Birthday?

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8161, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8181, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold, and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled Rings by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

Opera or Field Glasses

THESE glasses are not, of course, as powerful as those sold at a high price, yet they will be found very satisfactory and extremely useful on many occasions. Although commonly known as opera glasses, they can also be used out of doors for identifying people, animals and objects within a reasonable distance. Farmers, motorists, Boy Scouts, hunters, fishermen, etc., will find these glasses to be just what they need to take with them on their trips through fields and woods. They are durably made and can be conveniently carried in the neat leatherette case which is included free.

These Glasses are made in Europe which accounts for the low price that makes this offer possible. They are yours free on the terms of the following special offer:

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you these Opera or Field Glasses in a leatherette case, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 1232.

Five Wheel Chairs in February
676 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The recipients of the five February wheel chairs are: Helen Monical, Kalvesta, Kans., 120; Mrs. Ida Mae Long, Lewiston, Pa., 77; Oscar Payne, Pelham, Ala., 61; Jessie L. V. Martin, R. 5, Marietta, Ga., 59; Oscar E. Ellington, Bells, Tenn., 59. The figures following their respective addresses indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by these applicants or by their friends for them.

HELEN MONICAL, age 8, is paralyzed from her hips down and bedridden, due to tuberculosis of the spine which has also caused such a curvature of the spine that she is obliged to lie always on one side. She is one of a large family of children. The wheel chair will alleviate her discomfort and lessen her mother's burden in caring for her.

MRS. IDA MAE LONG, age 45, since six months past has been and still is so crippled in her lower limbs by rheumatism that she can not walk even with crutches.

OSCAR PAYNE, age 40, has been a helpless cripple from birth, never able to walk, and now has no use of his hands. He is dependent on his father who is past 70 years of age and not in easy circumstances.

MRS. MAG SNODGRASS ENJOYING HER COMFORT WHEEL CHAIR.

JESSIE L. V. MARTIN, age 7, was afflicted with sickness at fifteen months of age which left her paralyzed from her hips down. She has never been able to walk but can use her hands. This wheel chair will be a joy to her and a help to her mother in caring for her.

OSCAR E. ELLINGTON, age 8, when a baby suffered an attack of infantile paralysis which left him crippled in his legs so that he has never been able to walk. His legs are shrunken, never having developed in proportion to the rest of his body.

These are all very sad cases, but doubtless the wheel chairs which I am sending to these poor unfortunates will mitigate their suffering and brighten their lives. My thanks to all who have helped in this good work, and I pray you and others to support it.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT,
Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little easier each month than you do yours

Her Comfort Wheel Chair a Blessing.

Central City, Ky.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I enclose a picture of Mrs. Mag Snodgrass, of Powderly, Ky., in her wheel chair obtained by subscriptions to COMFORT. The chair is indeed a blessing to her. She is known to her many friends as being meek, patient and long-suffering, and her tongue is governed by the law of kindness. May God bless and help her is the prayer of her friends. Thanking you and others who have helped her to obtain her chair, I am

Truly yours,
Rachel McNeil.

We Will Spend 25c On Anyone Suffering From Constipation

Send your address at the earliest possible moment and you will receive a trial bottle of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin free of charge

YOU men and women who are real hard sufferers from constipation, listen and realize how easy it is to get relief when the right remedy is used. It will cost 25c to send you a free trial bottle of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, but we will gladly do it for anyone who asks. Let those who live at a distance be sure to write. Fill out the coupon below or simply write on a post card or in a letter: "Send me a free trial bottle of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin."

We want to prove to mothers that Syrup Pepsin is better for the children and herself than harsh physics that gripe and weaken, and which you have to force people to take; to prove to elderly people that Syrup Pepsin is better than salt waters and powders and pills, as it does not lose its good effect by repeated use and the doseage does not have to be increased; to prove that artificial coal-tar drugs in candy form, which can cause skin eruptions and heart affections, are not as good as a vegetable preparation like Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin.

Ask for the free trial bottle of Syrup Pepsin if you can use it right now for constipation, biliousness, flatulency, wind or gas, sour and colicky stomach, indigestion, dizziness, intestinal poisoning, loss of appetite and sleep, auto-intoxication, dyspepsia, and to break up fevers and colds. Take it yourself; give it to anyone, infant or adult. It is safe.

There must be something unusual about this Syrup Pepsin. It is today, after 30 years of public use, the largest selling family laxative in the world. Don't you want to try such a wonderful laxative of which more than 10 million bottles are sold and paid for every year? You can do it free. We will gladly spend 25c on your family to send you a trial bottle and show you that what we claim you can prove. Write today, addressing your envelope as shown in the coupon.

Comfort's League of Cousins

when we can look up to the hills and claim our own. Nature can always take us and heal all our hurts—rubbing like a kind mother the bumps that life has given us.

Rose, you are "happy, contented and unusually strong" because you are living the life God meant you to live—and loving it as you live it. If you cannot paint the beauty of your Cumberlands which you see about you, you can at least hold the colors in your heart. Here in this packed city it makes me happy to think of you upon your hilltop—where neither sunrise nor sunset are hid from you. For the pictures of the Greatest Painter were meant to be seen and loved. The best that man can do is to take up brush with humility and try to transcribe what he sees with awe. For it's a beautiful world, Rose, and "it is good for us to be here."

LA RUE, ARKANSAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Open the door and let me in to your happy circle, for it is cold weather in the Ozarks, and Jack Frost will have me yelping with pain on account of frozen fingers and toes.

I live nine miles from a railroad, in a valley which isn't very thickly settled. We are about a mile and a half from White River. We have a real nice and interesting country—or at least I think so.

Among the most interesting places is a bluff known as the Indian Bluff. It is well named, for people hunting for Indian relics searched the bluff and found many things—among them being skeletons, baskets, paint, etc. We have many different kinds of trees and several varieties of nuts—such as chinquapins, hazel nuts and walnuts. Benton County, the county we live in, leads the state in the growing of apples.

Perhaps you would like to know who is writing all this. It is a blue-eyed girl, with brown hair, who is about five feet tall and who wants to hear from all the cousins.

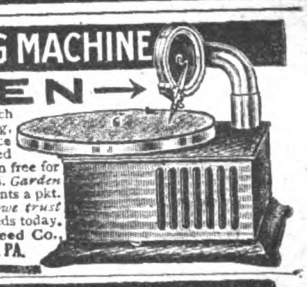
I go to school about two miles from home. I am also organist and teacher of one of the classes in our Sunday school.

I'd like to hear from any of the cousins, no matter where they live, and would also like to receive photographs of them.

Your loving niece and cousin, OVA MCGUINNIS.

P. S. Oh, I forgot to tell you how young I am! I'm sixteen years old.

It worries me, Ova, to think that all the letters and photographs you are going to receive will have to be toted nine miles and perhaps dropped in the White River on the way. Can't you get the railroad to run a COMFORT extension out to La Rue? Tell them about the mail contracts they can get and see if something can't be done about it. Otherwise I fear your mail service is going to break down, or be seriously cracked.



Your Indians were no bluffers, Ova, and sure delivered the goods when the relic hunters took up their Bluff. Think of the poor red man who had to live on bluffs before the days of Fords, victrolas and equal suffrage! How those unfortunate and too-early Americans ever got any joy out of life is a mystery to me. I'm not surprised they went right ahead and died and became cigar store emblems and museum relics. Some of 'em even formed lodges.

Will you, Ova, please tell me what kind of a nut is a chinquapin? Is it anything like a cotter pin? If it is, it must have a strong oily flavor—something like cup grease. I have heard a lot about chinquapins, but none ever chinked around close enough for me to get a look or taste. I like to learn, Ova, and I'm always ready to ask questions—so come on with your chinquapin statistics. Do they make good cake filling and nut butter—or is the flavor too sharp? I know you'll see the point.

Ova, it would have been terrible if you had really forgotten to tell us how old you were. We might have thought you as ancient as an Indian relic if you hadn't come out with the young and awful truth. But don't fret, my dear; you'll be a little older every year—although I once knew

Fifteen Crochet Books

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

ANY ONE of these books is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The fifteen books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting, tatting and knitting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Each book is 8 by 11 inches in size and most of them contain 32 pages. Following is a brief description of what you will find in this wonderful library. When ordering please give the number of each book wanted.

Volume 33 Twenty-one new, beautiful designs in Cluny laces, including lamp shades, curtains, bungalow sets, hats, yokes, collar and cuffs, pin-cushion, door panel, flower basket, baby cap, bib, doily, pillow-case, corset-cover, boudoir cap and corners and edges for handkerchiefs, napkins, etc. 32 pages.

Volume 34 Fourteen handsome crochet yokes, camisoles and corset-covers in medallion pointed wheel, Irish rose, shell, poinsettia, cupid, wheel, Grecian, spider, small shell and novelty braid. 32 pages.

Volume 35 Fifty-three different crochet edges for every purpose—children's clothing, handkerchiefs, towels, doilies, scarfs, etc., etc. 32 pages.

Volume 36 How to crochet beautiful Cluny laces—thirty-two different designs for library scarfs, curtains, yokes, sofa pillow, centerpieces, collar and cuff set, combination, doily, boudoir caps, corset-covers, combing jacket, novelty braid and towel edge and ends. 32 pages.

Volume 37 Thirty-six new, original designs in tatting. Edges, insertions and motifs for yokes, handkerchiefs, towels, luncheon sets, piano scarfs, curtains, cushions, medallions, etc. 32 pages.

Volume 38 Twenty-eight lovely designs in crocheted centerpieces, lemonade sets, doilies, luncheon sets, lunch cloths, etc., etc. One of the very latest books to be published. 32 pages.

Volume 39 Twelve beautiful designs in crocheted yokes for slip-overs, corset-covers and nightgowns. Large, magnificent, full-page illustrations showing every stitch with complete directions for making and kind and quantity of material required is fully explained. 16 pages.

Volume 40 A continuation of Volume 39, showing twelve more exquisite yokes for corset-covers and nightgowns. Full-page illustrations. Full directions. 16 pages.

Volume 41 Crocheted bags are now all the style and this book shows twenty-nine beautiful designs for hand bags, party bags, afternoon bags, work bags, laundry bags, opera, evening and vanity bags and coin purses. 16 pages.

Volume 42 Tam sport hats and tab collars in crochet, knitting and tatting—twenty-nine designs and every one a beauty. Illustrations show large-size finished work as well as being worn by living models. 32 pages.

Volume 43 Twenty-nine lovely silk sweaters and sport hats in crochet and knitting, including the Delmar, Pershing, Rosedale, Kingsbury, Waterman, Westminster, MacPherson, Hamilton and many others. Every design is shown on a living model. 32 pages.

Volume 44 Art needle work for baby and the children. Forty-four beautiful designs in crochet and tatting for sweaters, yokes, bonnets, hats, caps, booties, filet jackets, buggy covers and pillows, bibs, dresses and leggings. 32 pages.

Let Us Give You This Fruit And Flower Garden!

WE have made a new arrangement this season with a well-known nursery company, whereby we can now offer our readers a complete fruit orchard and flower garden consisting of some of the finest apples, pears, berries, grapes and ornamental shrubs grown. The stock will be sent to you direct from the nursery in Michigan by parcel post prepaid. We guarantee that it will reach you in perfect condition and grow to your entire satisfaction if the directions for planting are carefully followed. If for any reason any of the trees, bushes, vines or shrubs should fail to meet with your expectations we will replace them for you free of all charge.

ALL of the grape vines, raspberries and dewberries in these Collections are healthy, well-rooted year-old plants. They should bear fruit the second year. The apple and pear tree grafts are made from heavy one-year-old roots and scions of this year's growth. They should grow from four to six feet the first year. The shrubs are one year old and should bloom the first year from planting. With each Collection you will also receive full instructions on planting, pruning, and the care of fruit and shrubs, what fertilizer to use and the kind of soil best adapted to the production of heavy yields. Just read what these big Collections contain.

6 Year-Old Grape Vines

Collection No. 8761 These are not "calloused cuttings" but heavily rooted year-old vines, guaranteed to live and bear fruit the second year. They will grow anywhere in the United States. With these six vines in your yard or garden you will soon have all the table grapes you can use and many more besides, to sell or to give away to your friends. This Collection contains the following varieties:

Two Moore's Diamond A well-known variety that produces immense clusters of grapes, yellowish white in color and similar to the Concord in shape of bunch and flavor. It is very hardy and a thrifty grower, making an unusually good vine for arbor or trellis. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

Two Concord This famous variety is the finest purple grape ever grown. They are large, luscious and juicy and so sweet that little or no sugar is required in making grape juice and jelly. Each one of these vines should produce a bushel of choice grapes in a single season. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

Two Worden Always a favorite, this variety yields large, well-shouldered clusters of deliciously sweet, highly-flavored fruit. Grape juice and jelly made from this grape is of a peculiarly spicy flavor that is relished by all. It is also one of the finest table grapes and a good shipper. It ripens two weeks earlier than the Concord. You get two of these year-old vines in this Collection.

7 Flowering Shrubs

Collection No. 8781 There is nothing that will improve the appearance of your home more than these beautiful ornamental shrubs and vines. From earliest spring until late fall there is not a day but one or more of these shrubs are in bloom. They are field grown, one year old, well rooted and about one foot high when you receive them. This Collection contains the following varieties:

One White Flowering Dogwood—one of the earliest spring bloomers, Two Roses of Sharon—bearing a profusion of large double blossoms from August until late fall, Two Golden Bell—bears tiny bell-shaped yellow flowers, One Hall's Japan Honeysuckle—an ornamental climber with fragrant blossoms, and One Spirea Van Houttei—an early bloomer famed for its handsome foliage and clusters of pretty white flowers. You get these seven ornamentals (five different varieties) in this Collection.

8 Apple And Pear Grafts

Collection No. 8751 Think of the value of an orchard of these eight thrifty, healthy trees. Think how soon they will be yielding bushels of the finest apples and pears grown. With the heavy root system on these grafts they should grow from four to six feet the first year. This Collection contains the following varieties:

Two Delicious The finest winter apple grown, a heavy yielder, and ripens early. The fruit is medium large, delicious in flavor and colored a beautiful red. This variety always sells for the highest market prices as it keeps well and retains its crisp, firm white flesh to the end. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Wealthy A hardy Russian fall apple with deep red and bronze streaked skin. The flesh is firm and crisp, the flavor sweet yet tart. For both eating and cooking it has few equals and is one of the most profitable apples grown. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Jonathan This apple ripens in October and because of its juicy, winy flavor is considered one of the best eating apples on the market. It is red in color with a smooth, waxy skin. You will enjoy gathering the huge crops that this variety invariably yields. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Two Bartlett Pear One of the best-known varieties, more largely grown than any other. You are probably familiar with its yellow skin with its pronounced red blush, and its sweet, juicy flesh of a delightfully spicy flavor. This variety makes the best table pear, being very mellow when ripe and always yields a heavy crop. You get two of these tree grafts in this Collection.

Our Free Offer!

FOR only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you any one of these Collections free by parcel post prepaid. For two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you any two Collections—for three one-year subscriptions any three Collections—and so on. When ordering please be sure to mention the number of each Collection wanted.

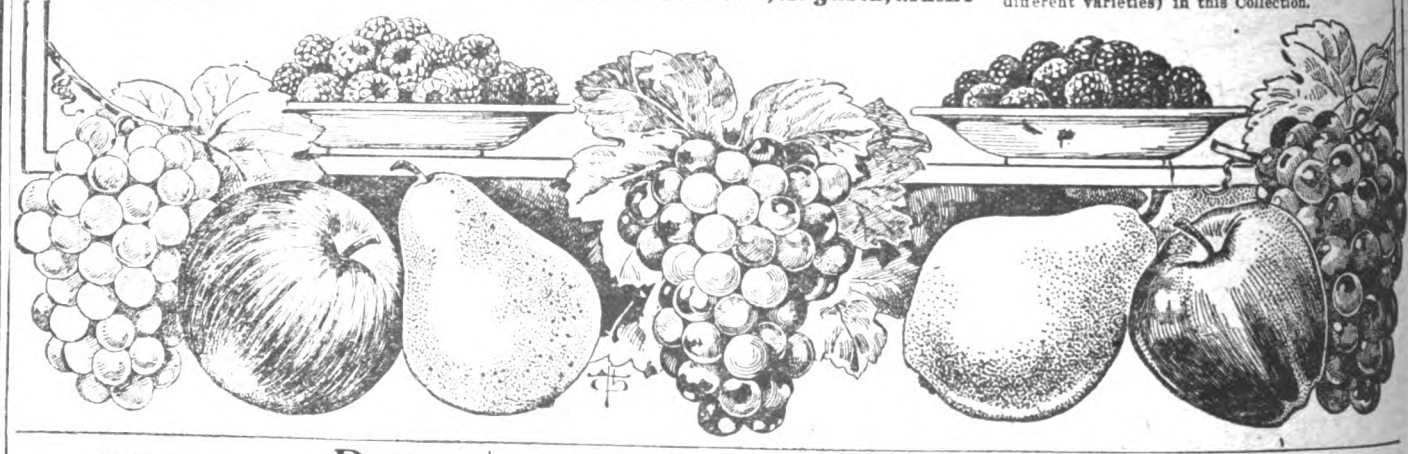
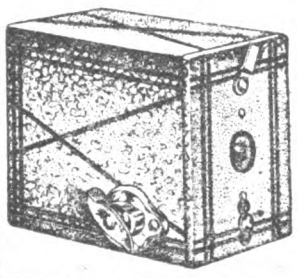
8 Luscious New Fruits

Collection No. 8771 Your garden is not complete without berries and in this Collection you will receive three of the finest varieties grown. For the table, for the most delicious jams, jellies and preserves, they are unexcelled. Each plant is one year old with strong, healthy roots. The Collection contains the following varieties:

Four Lucretia Dewberry A vigorous grower that attains such size that the support of a trellis is really needed. The vines are literally covered with immense clusters of delicious wine-flavored berries, averaging one and one-half inches in length, very sugary, remarkably juicy and having but a few fine seeds. You get four of these year-old vines in this Collection.



Two Red Raspberry This variety (St. Regis) is the finest everbearing red raspberry. The bush is a rapid grower, bearing fruit ten days earlier than most other varieties and continuing to bear throughout the summer and fall. The fruit is large, of delightful flavor, sweet and very juicy, and ripens in large clusters. You get two of these year-old bushes in this Collection.



Two Black Raspberry This variety (Black Diamond) is named from its habit of fruiting in large clusters. The berries are of good size, remarkably sweet and juicy, but firm in texture. The canes grow rapidly and are very tall and upright. Its distinguishing feature, however, is its immense yield which together with its fine quality make it the most desirable garden and market berry. You get two of these year-old bushes in this Collection.

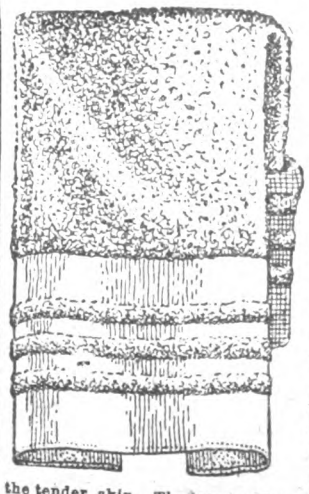
7 Flowering Shrubs

Collection No. 8791 With one exception this Collection is different from Collection No. 8781, although comprising shrubs which bloom from spring until late fall. All of them are field grown, one year old, well rooted and about one foot high when you receive them. In this Collection you will receive the following varieties:

Two Roses of Sharon, One Snow Ball Hydrangea—a midsummer bloomer bearing immense quantities of snowy-white blossoms, One Purple Lilac—its fragrant purple flowers need no description, Two Thunberg Barberry—fine for a hedge, bearing pretty red berries which stay on all winter, and One Trumpet Vine—a hardy climber for porch or arbor, bearing throughout summer and fall large clusters of orange-colored flowers. You get these seven ornamentals (five different varieties) in this Collection.

Premo Camera

Reward No. 7944



Films And Instruction Book Free

THIS is not a toy but a genuine "Premo" camera, made by the Eastman Kodak Co., therefore you can depend upon it to produce the most pleasing and satisfactory results. It takes a picture 1¼ by 1¾ inches, is fitted with the best quality Meniscus lens and an automatic shutter adapted for snapshots and time exposures. The pictures may be taken either the long way or the short way of the camera. It uses the regulation roll film cartridge containing six exposures, and this may be put in the camera and taken out again in broad daylight, so that you don't have to go into a dark room every time you want to load the camera. Anybody can make good pictures with this camera. Being small and compact, it is just the thing to carry with you to "snap" pictures of your friends, sports, etc., with. And remember, we send you not only the camera itself but also include One Six Exposure Roll Film Cartridge and Instruction Book, all packed together in a strong box and sent to you Free by Parcel Post, prepaid, on the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you by parcel post, prepaid, this Premo Camera with one Roll Film Cartridge containing six exposures and complete Instruction Book. Reward No. 7944.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Two Turkish Towels

Good Size Soft And Fleecy

AFTER bathing there is nothing quite as fine as a good rub down with a Turkish towel, in fact it is the best towel for all purposes, whether for the bathroom, guestroom or everyday family use. They absorb the water much more readily than other towels and the soft fleece-like surface imparts to the body a delightful feeling of warmth and well-being. They are also fine for baby's toilet as they will not hurt the tender skin. The towels offered here are 15 inches wide and 32 inches long which is a good convenient size for all-round family use, and are of good weight, well made and finished. We will make you a present of two of these towels upon the terms of the following offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you one pair (2) of these fine Turkish Towels free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 9912.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

In A Leatherette Pocket Case

3-Piece Scissor Set

Reward No. 9093

For A Club Of Three

THIS useful 3-piece Scissor Set is just what every woman needs. It consists of a pair of 6-inch scissors, a pair of 5-inch scissors and a pair of 4-inch scissors, made of the best steel, highly tempered and handsomely nickel plated. They are ground to a keen cutting edge that will last a long time without resharpening. The complete assortment comes in an attractive leatherette case which fastens with a ball-and-socket device. This case makes it very convenient to carry all three pieces in the pocket or in a shopping or traveling bag. This is one of the most useful rewards we have ever offered and we expect a great demand for it among COMFORT'S lady and girl readers who have a lot of sewing and dressmaking to do. It is yours free if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this 3-Piece Scissor Set in a fine leatherette case free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9093.

Manners and Looks

Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal clearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

SUBSCRIBER, Jerico Springs, Mo.—You may show the boy caller where he may lay or hang his hat and coat, but it is best you do not take them from him or assist him in any way in this. Do not say: "Take a chair." Some chairs are rather heavy to carry, you know, and probably your folks would not want you to walk away any of the family furniture. But you may say: "Won't you sit down?"—giving him a good example by seating yourself. (2) Some boys are as timid as young rabbits, while others are as forward as spring robins northern Florida. They all require special handling, for the disposition to kiss readily seems to be inherent in the species. If a boy kisses you against your will you may show your displeasure in any way you like that seems appropriate to the occasion. One way would be to deny him any further opportunities by refusing to see him again, and another would be to offer a prompt and fair-fingered slap in exchange. Or you might say to him: "If you are going to do the things you know I do not want you to do, it is best that we cease to be friends or see each other." Add a little temper and dignity to this formula and see how it works. But in some boys the kissing instinct is as indicable as ink stains in pink crepe de chene,—or white for corn in young Durocs.

G., Chickasha, Okla.—It would fall to the man to seat the table, or chaffer with the head waiter, when you as your escort at dinner or luncheon at a hotel or cafe. But suggestions would be permissible from you such as: "Let's sit over there," or, "It would be better to be nearer the music," etc. Your escort would take the order to the waiter for both of you—after having heard from you what you wished to eat; but here, you could, if necessary, interpose suggestions or corrections in the order as he gives it. For instance, he might wish Russian dressing in place of mayonnaise for your salad, etc. These things, you will note, are matters of common sense, in which etiquette will not be supposed to foolishly interfere—and spoil the meal. If you are going on to a play after the dinner or to a matinee after luncheon, it would be your host who would be supposed to be responsible for getting you there on time and seeing that the meal was not hurried in too lingering a fashion. But if your eye on the watch or clock should show that he was neglecting there would be no harm in reminding him of the lapse of time. You would not remove your hat when dining or dining in this way at a cafe, and your wrap would be left to fall from your shoulders over the back of your chair. You would, of course, remove your gloves.

B., Hunter, N. Y.—Introductions are best made as simply as possible, care being used to see that the names are plainly pronounced. A man in all ordinary cases is supposed to be introduced or presented to the woman. A boy to a girl, etc. By saying, "Miss Blank, this is Mr. Dash," you will have fulfilled all requirements of etiquette in such an introduction as you desire, although a skillful introducer can often add a few words to start conversation and break the social ice. (2) If you do not wish to dance with this boy, you may say that you are tired and prefer to rest out the set. Or you might skillfully say: "Why don't you dance this with Susie Blank? I wish you would: I know she has been wanting to have you ask her." But the last method requires finesse. The best way of all to avoid dance with a boy you don't like, is to have the dance previously promised to a boy you do. But here is where perhaps even more finesse is necessary!

MARRIED LITTLE GIRL, Tennessee.—If you were engaged to this man for three years before his marriage, I should certainly like to know why, when he now has a lovely little wife and a dear little boy," he still loves you and you love him. It would seem that with his prolonged love he ought to have married you ago, instead of now calmly talking of divorcing his wife and taking you for second choice. Fortunately divorces are not so easily obtained. Good cause must be shown if wives and babies are to be carelessly tossed aside. From your letter, we believe that this married man is attempting to keep up his old intimacy with you by trying to make you believe he will marry you two years from now. If you are so foolish as to trust him with his story and in this two-year promise, we cannot help you. We can only remind you that a man false to his wife woman is likely to be false to another. And aptly, if once engaged to you, he may have been false to you once before. What we think of this man we did not read well in COMFORT. If you have given your age correctly, the whole thing is more outrageous than ever. Break with this man and make your choice of a husband, now or two years from now, to a man who has not already shown himself false to his obligations and to those he has agreed to love and protect.

M. C., Wingo, Ky.—You ask that we make a decision for you, which we hesitate to do—not knowing this boy of whom you think so much and your family so little. If it is true that the only fault your friends can find in him is his present lack of means, we certainly will not hesitate to say that this objection may safely be written off the slate. Henry Ford and John D. Rockefeller, for two instances, started off in life with no more than this boy you love, but these men, and others like them, have had the raw wealth of imagination and energy which they coined into great fortunes. It is for you and your parents to judge if this boy has the qualities making for success—and to discover if these is not always easy. But the defects that you see for failure are not so hard to see—and perhaps your parents have noted some of these dangerous defects in this boy to which your love leaves you blind. But there is no getting around the fact—and other readers of this column should take note—that years bring experience and capacity for judgment. Your parents must be wiser than you are at eighteen, even though to you they may seem prejudiced and intolerant in this matter where your young heart is concerned. But we do not think they are just blind, at least on the face of your letter, in keeping you out of school and trying to force from you a promise not to speak to this boy. Unless the boy's character is other than you state, we think they are taking a strong a stand. They should recognize, as even you admit that it is impossible for this boy to support you for that any marriage between you would be impossible for several years at least. This being so, they should not let your education and happiness suffer too much because of a determination to make you bow to their will in what, after all, is only a boy-and-girl love affair—which a few years, or another boy or girl, may change forever.

M., Hunters, Calif.—If you are not to have a large wedding, yet plan to be married in a going-away gown, we fancy you must be arranging for a quiet church wedding—or one at your church parsonage—with only a few friends and your immediate relatives present. We say this, for we believe you understand that at any large church wedding you could not wear a going-away costume, but would have to assume the conventional apparel of white or cream-colored silk or satin, with or without veil. With a going-away costume such as you plan and describe, while your hat may not be of the same color as your suit, it should surely be of a color that would harmonize, and the hat should not clash either in style or shade with your gown. Personally we should prefer a hat of the same color—or at least a shade of such color. Do not let the hat be over-elaborate in size or trimming. Yes; navy blue would be a suitable color for your gown, as would be also dark brown or any of the darker shades of green. Have your gown carefully tailored, but not overtrimmed. Serge or broadcloth, or any firmly-woven material would be correct. Only the left glove should be removed for the ceremony, or such glove may not be moved but simply turned back over the wrist. Sometimes only the wedding ring finger of the glove is slit for convenience. The engagement ring may be removed, but it may be worn on the other hand during the ceremony. We think the old conventional altar kiss may be safely left for a less public appearance.

RED BLOODED, BANG-UP STORIES!

12 GREAT BOOKS!

QUICKSHOT OF THE RIO GRANDE, Stephen Chalmers
"Lookin' f'r Trouble is my middle name," said Impulsive Pep, adventuring cowpuncher. And there on the border, among raiding Mexican bandits, train robbers, Texas rangers, a prairie fire—not to mention a pair of blue eyes—he did not have far to look.

LOADED DICE Edwin L. Sabin
A romance of Texas, of the early days, when lives depended on the quickness of draw, and all the courage of the pioneers was needed to brave the perils they so fearlessly faced. A thrilling tale of men who were jugglers with death.

SONTAG OF SUNDOWN W. C. Tuttle
The story of the question of ownership of the TJ ranch—a question which promoted bloodshed and a war of no mean caliber. The cowpunchers of this story will live long in your memory for their originality and enterprise. They are men whose best friends were their nerve and their gun.

SPAWN OF THE DESERT W. C. Tuttle
A tale of Calico Town: Where men lived raw in the desert's maw, and Hell was nothing to shun; where they buried 'em neat, without preacher or sheet and writ on their tombstone, crude but sweet, "This jasper was slow with his gun."

ARIZONA ARGONAUTS H. Bedford-Jones
Three adventurers whose fortune in the Arizona desert lead through drought and danger to the goal they sought gold, free gold, the gold of which they had always dreamed. They were men quick on the trigger who loved to face odds.

THE LURE OF PIPER'S GLEN, Theodore Goodridge Roberts
It was the lure of all the great timber country of the North of plentiful game, of the clear wind from the great plains. The call came South; young Jim Todhunter heard it, and a great tide of life in the North caught him up—to bring adventure a-plenty.

APACHE VALLEY Arthur Chapman
A story of a cattle war in the southwest, with all it means—terror and blood feud; alarms by night and day; rustling and stealthy murder. And through it all are woven the lives of true men as well as thieves, men whose lives reflected the glories of the land they protected.

THE CHALLENGE OF THE NORTH James B. Hendryx
This is a story of the call of the great Northland; of purposes and cross purposes; of true men and of "bad" men; and of big deals and pioneering triumphs. A tale of the north which holds for the young, the strong and the brave adventures that are countless.

THE SECOND MATE H. Bedford-Jones
Peril and mutiny on the China Seas. When every scupper was running red, and with two white women at the mercy of a villainous crew composed of the sweepings of the outermost islands, Jim Barnes realized the gage of desperate battle he had accepted when he signed on as second mate of the Sulu Queen.

THE DEVIL'S PAYDAY W. C. Tuttle
A sky of brass, the sun a flame,
And the land no place to dwell;
The only spot that God forgot.
That it still belongs to Hell.

THE CANYON OF THE CREE DEATH. F. R. Buckley
Who were the devils in human form whose haunt was the lost barranca? Invisible, terrible, they brought the redoubtable young officer of the law to a strange dilemma. The law of the land commanded him not to desert his prisoners; the law of the desert ordained that he stand by his companions. Which did the Fates decree he should obey?

SKY-HIGH CORRAL Ralph Cummins
A yarn of the unending feuds between cattlemen and forest rangers; of the forest fires, grazing herds and bitter fights at timberline. Yet in the end our gallant young ranger through ordeal of battles, fire and blood brought the old timers to see that the new ways of forest conservation are best.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

When mending knees and seat of overalls, rip the inseam of legs from hem to hem. Then you can lay them flat and patch on the sewing machine. Sew up the seam again with double or triple stitching and they're as good as new. Patch everything possible on machine. It is more serviceable and saves wear on nerves as well as time.

Make drawing pads for children of wrapping paper. Iron the paper if wrinkled and bind on machine or by hand with bright colored cloth, or punch holes in one side and tie with bright colored twine. If the children are small they will like the paper cut in shapes of animals.

Save cold cream jars, etc., for jelly and jam for school lunches. Never put jelly on sandwiches as it soaks in and they are less palatable. The jars are the right size and the screw tops keep the contents from spilling.

Crushed brown-bread crumbs make an excellent substitute for nuts in cake.

If you tear your rubbers down the side they can be mended with a piece of adhesive tape. It must be used on the inside and serves well only when it doesn't get too wet.—OREGON BROWNIE, Goble, Oregon.

To remove white spots from furniture, rub with sweet spirits of niter.—MRS. D. L., Patten, Kans.

To mend old corsets to keep steels from pushing through the second time. Pull steels out a couple of inches and file two notches opposite each other. Push back in place and sew with strong thread through the notches. I have found this to be the best plan I ever tried.

A good way to change high shoes into low ones is to cut the top off shoes down as far as the fifth eyelet, then turn in edge of kid and lining and stitch on sewing machine. I did this and was much pleased with results. It saved buying a pair of low shoes for morning wear.—MISS LILLIAN STEVENS, Barclay, Md.

To clean a straw or white felt hat, put the hat over the end of the ironing board or any clean board and with a stiff brush scrub thoroughly with gasolene or gasolene and ammonia and—this is important—while still wet rub over with a lump of gloss starch and allow to get bone dry and brush thoroughly. I think you will be pleased with the result.

Perhaps sometime you have cleaned some light colored material with gasolene and viewed with consternation the ring that was left around the spot and the longer you cleaned the worse it got. Try this method: This applies to woolen and cotton material only. Take a little warm water and rub spot gently so as not to injure the nap. If warm water will not do it take a little Ivory soap. After spot is out rinse with a little clean water. Then rub over the entire wet spot with a lump of gloss starch, being especially careful to rub the edge of the wet place. When thoroughly dry, brush off and press. This should be done with the spot on a board with a few thicknesses of cloth under it to keep the water from running and making too large a spot. A piece of cheese-cloth makes a good sponge.

To boil cracked eggs, add a little vinegar to the water to prevent the whites from boiling out.

To clean screen doors, dip a stiff brush in kerosene and go over screens with it. They will look like new.—BENTON, ARK.

A silk dress is more difficult. Try cleaning with gasolene first, that is, wash it all over in gasolene. This takes out all the dust and loose dirt. For the spots that gasolene won't bring out, put it over a clean board and with a piece of cheese-cloth for a sponge go over the entire dress or if it is a two-piece dress or with a belt you may only need to sponge to the waist, or perhaps just the waist. Be careful to wet the goods all over for if you skip one dry spot it will leave a ring around it. After you have gone over the dress and taken out all the spots hang on a hanger and hold over an electric fan and keep turning to dry it evenly. If you have no electric fan choose a windy day and do likewise. Hold the skirt open over the fan and do not let it fold together anywhere while real wet or it will streak. Iron on the wrong side quickly with not too hot an iron. This sounds like a lot of trouble but it has saved me a cleaner's bill many times and you can clean a dress for a small expense and in some cases it don't cost a cent.

A good way to clean white kid gloves is to wash thoroughly with gasolene and while wet stretch over the hands and rub in a good coat of whiting. Hang up to dry and then put on again and with your elbows on a table let some one rub the gloves with a clean cloth (or do it yourself, one hand at a time) until all whiting is rubbed off so it will not come off on the clothing and at the same time gives the gloves a shine that makes them look like new.—A HOME CLEANER, Flinton, Pa.

Deaf Can Hear Says Science

New Invention Aids Thousands

Here's good news for all who suffer from deafness. The Dictograph Products Corporation announces the perfection of a remarkable device which has enabled thousands of deaf persons to hear as well as ever. The makers of this wonderful device say it is too much to expect you to believe this, so they are going to give you a chance to try it at home. They offer to send it by prepaid parcel post on a ten-day free trial. They do not send it C. O. D.—they require no deposit—there is no obligation.

They send it entirely at their own expense and risk. They are making this extraordinary offer well knowing that the magic of this little instrument will so amaze and delight the user that the chances of its being returned are very slight. Thousands have already accepted this offer and report most gratifying results. There's no longer any need that you should endure the mental and physical strain which comes from a constant effort to hear. Now you can mingle with your friends without that feeling of sensitiveness from which all deaf persons suffer. Now you can take your place in the social and business world to which your talents entitle you and from which your affliction has, in a measure, excluded you. Just send your name and address to The Dictograph Products Corporation, Suite 1302-L, 220 W. 42nd St., New York, for descriptive literature and request blank.

a girl in Massachusetts who got stuck for a long time at twenty-eight. I thought she'd never pull through.

LINDEN, IOWA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

"I'm from Ioway, Ioway,
State of all the land,
Joy on every hand,
I'm from Ioway, Ioway,
That's where the tall corn grows!"

Please, Billy, now won't you let me by for singing you the chorus of our state song? I am seventeen years old, have dark brown hair, bobbed; hazel eyes and an Iowa complexion. Does anyone know what this last is? Well, Flo Ziegfield once said—but I guess I won't tell you for fear some of the cousins will think I'm vain. I hope I'm not, anyway. I am five feet, three inches tall and weigh 115 pounds.

I am a senior in high school this year and I happen to be the only girl in my class. Our school is not very large but we sure have lots of fun.

May I say a word on the flapper question? Perhaps there are some who think I am a flapper because I have my hair bobbed. If a flapper is one who is full of fun, always ready for a good time, and loves the great outdoors, then I must be one. But really, Uncle Lisha, do you think short hair makes any change on the inside of a girl? I don't, and the people around here are broad-minded enough to feel the same way. Personally, I think it is a clean, sensible, healthy style and I'm going to have mine bobbed.

I would like to hear from lots of cousins, because I certainly do enjoy making new pen-friends. It is very interesting to receive letters from all over the U. S. A. and from foreign lands. I correspond with a person in Birmingham, England, and his letters are very interesting to read. I also have a Honolulu correspondent. In this way one finds out many things about our own country and other countries not known before. For instance, this boy in England said that there were people over there who believed every person over here was connected with the cinema industry and that we all got divorces at least once in our lives.

This letter is long enough, so I will close.

Lovingly, FREDA BURNHAM.

Freda, I'm glad to see you come out of the tall corn, singing as you come. I wish you had included in your song just what Flo Ziegfield said about Iowa complexions. This Ziegfield is a knowing Manhattan person and his judgment counts a lot on complexions—much more than it would on corn, for instance. To be a Ziegfield Follies' girl is equivalent to being the last and loveliest word in feminine pulchritude, so if you have a Ziegfield standard of complexion, Freda, I'm willing to let you be just a little vain—if you really want to be.

As for bobbed hair, Freda, I say again, as I've said before, I do not like it. The bobbing may make no change on the inside of a girl, but said girlie must have gone through some sort of an internal change before she decided to part with her natural adornment. If ten years before bobbed hair became the rage, any girl had been told she must snip off her hair level with the back of her neck—why she'd have thrown sixteen sorts of fits. It's a clean and sensible and healthful custom, Freda but so is going barefooted, for instance. But now bobbed hair is bobbing out of style again and tresses are lengthening like the skirts. So swings the pendulum, and dressmakers and hairdressers thrive.

Freda, that English friend of yours has certainly been reading our newspaper headlines with care. And so his opinions are largely justified. If I thought our great country was what the newspaper captions and Sunday supplements make it out to be, I'd just put Billy in a crate and ship with him for New Guinea, Tahiti or Zanzibar. For there newspapers, movies and divorce courts cease to trouble. Coal strikes exist not and subways do not sub. Restaurants could be foiled by roast monkey and breadfruit. I think I'll get a few folders of steamers sailing out of San Francisco and so be prepared for the worst. But the worst would be measuring Bill for a crate.

JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

May I chat with you and cousins for a few minutes? I will not stay long. I am a lonely boy, living among the lonely pines, in a lonely mansion, all alone in the central part of Mississippi. And I do my own cooking. No, I am not a bachelor—just a boy. I get very lonesome out here in my mansion with no one to listen to my groans except the lonely pines. No; I cannot send samples of my curls, for I have no curls; and I keep my hair cut so short I could not get enough for a sample.

I am sorry for the cousin who had to cut his hair all off to send samples to the "old maids." He should have said, "No samples given." I wonder if he is yet in his cave? I guess not, for some girl has probably got herself a good husband and gone to the city with him where you wear short hair all the time—if you wear any hair at all. I say, Cousin of the Ozarks, you are not the only lonely man. I have no high peak to hurl myself from—and I don't think I would if I had—but I have an old well in the back yard. I guess I will have to let those "lonesome blues" run their course—unless some cousin writes me a few cheering lines.

One cousin said she would be glad to exchange pictures with all the girls, but would not exchange any with the boys. She has a wise head on her shoulders. I was going to send her one of my pictures until I read: "I would rather the boys would not send theirs, because I will not give them one of mine." I was almost sick; I had lost out again.

My oak stove knows a secret I dare not tell; it would make the sighing pines blush to hear it. Will somebody send me a recipe how you cook corn bread that won't tear to pieces when it is put on the table? I can cook hot cake, coldcake, hard cakes, soft cakes, "spuds," and I can even boil water without burning it.

Gee, my hand is burning! I get burned every time I go in the kitchen. I am cooking supper. I am not much in the kitchen, but when you get me at the table you'd be surprised.

Well, I will tell you how I look and then I must go to supper. I am five feet, six inches short; weigh 160 pounds, have blue eyes, light brown hair, and a fair complexion.

By by until after supper!

J ELLIS STRICKLAND.

J. Ellis, it certianly beats all creation how many lonely boys we have amid the Happy Family—so lonely that they groan like a sick elephant and sigh like an Ohio blast furnace. However, it doesn't take long to cure 'em, I notice. Just one little appearance in our Big Family Circle and "the lonesome blues" are gone for good. Indeed most of the lonesome sufferers commence to back water and cry for help when the avalanche of mail hits 'em hard and they go under. I am going to try and save you, if possible, from that well bottom, Ellis. It would be a shame to spoil a good well of Ozark water with 160 pounds of corn-fed lonesomeness.

But, speaking of being corn fed, how do you ever expect anyone to send you a recipe for corn bread "that won't tear to pieces when it is put on the table"? Ellis, all the corn bread I ever saw put on any table was torn to pieces in short order—and sometimes the chawnking was awful to hear as the poor corn bread was being destroyed. No, Ellis, good corn bread was meant to be promptly torn. Who would want corn bread that had to be torn with an axe?

From all you said about your culinary skill, J. Ellis, I think it was wise that you described yourself before you went in to eat your lonesome-cooked supper. You might never have looked the same afterward. But don't hit the bottom of that well yet, Old Lonesomeness. All you need is a cook and a cook book to save you, and neither one is hard to acquire—even without curls.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for February

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Mrs. G. B. Ellison, Wikel, W. Va. Only partly recovered from one operation and faced by another, this suffering woman is forced to ask for aid. Clothes will be welcome, but money will help more. Well recommended. Susan Purdy, Sanville, Va. Old and afflicted, this aged COMFORT reader asks aid to take her through the winter. Give her a good boost forward with cash or clothes. Frankie Bennett, Greenfield, R. R. 1, Mo. An orphan boy of nine years, crippled and with a hospital experience of 23 months. Asks for any kind of cheer to "pass away the long winter days." This should be easy, cousins. Send along the cheer. Mrs. Susan Collins, Tomahawk, Ky. With a husband who is a helpless cripple, this poor woman is struggling on to care for the family. There are three children, of eight, 12 and 15 years. The two oldest are boys. Clothes and cash sent quick is the answer here. Miss Amanda Wycoff, care of Mr. Ellicott, Moundville, Mo. A bedridden old lady of 79 to whom a shower of quilt pieces or post cards would mean much happiness—little to give, but lots of joy it will mean. Mrs. Albert Dalton, Star, Va. An invalid for many long months, this mother of four young children—the oldest only eight years of age—asks for help of any sort to solve the problem of support and cheer. Mrs. Emma Wagoner, Shuff, Va. A widow with a boy of 11 and a girl of eight. With ill health and on rented land, she faces a hard time to carry on. Lift the load a little for her, folks.

The worst of winter is over, but not over are the sufferings, through pain and poverty, of those who ask for aid this month. Spring will come and the shut-in weeks of winter be past, but the darkened days of these sad ones must continue in any season. But cash, clothes and cheer can bring sunlight to these shadowed places. These gifts can lighten burdens for a time at least, can help problems of poverty and lessen the stress of pain. Think of these things, and as you think—give!

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

How a Good-Looking Postmaster Overpaid a Money Order

Will H. Hayes, at a movie men's dinner in New York, told stories of his Postoffice life.

"There was a handsome young village postmaster," he said, "who cashed one day a money order for a pretty girl. At the same time he pointed out to the girl that there was a message written in pencil on the margin of the order.

"'Yes, I know,' said she. 'It's a message from Jim. But I can't make it out. Can you?'

"'Sure, I can,' said the handsome young postmaster. 'It says: "Love and a dozen kisses." 'I've paid you your money I suppose you want your kisses now?'

"'Yes,' said the girl, blushing. 'If I'm entitled to them, of course I want them.'

"So the young postmaster leaned out of his little window and carefully gave her what had been sent on the margin of the money order.

"When the girl got home she said to her mother:

"'Mother, I do think the Government conducts its Postoffice in the most liberal way. Jim sent me an order for a dozen kisses by this morning's mail, and that good-looking young postmaster delivered me three dozen. Wasn't it just too nice of him?'"—Rehoboth Sunday Herald.

Great Britain "Funds" its War Debt to United States—First and Only European Nation to Settle

WHEN we entered the world war the Allies, who had already been fighting nearly three years, needed financial aid quite as much as military reinforcement. Because of our inexcusably neglected condition of unpreparedness it took us more than a year to raise, equip and train an effective force fit for service on the battle-field, but our Government could and did furnish immediate financial assistance in the form of loans authorized by Congress in connection with Liberty Bond legislation. Accordingly the United States Treasury loaned to all the European nations that were fighting Germany various sums, during the war, amounting in the aggregate to nearly nine and a half billion dollars, and after the armistice most of these nations bought U. S. army rations and other surplus war material, on credit, to the amount of about five hundred million dollars, thereby bringing the principal sum of their indebtedness to our Government up to nearly ten billion dollars.

Prior to August 21, 1922, there had been paid about two hundred million dollars on account of the purchase of army rations and surplus war material, and about five hundred million dollars on account of accrued interest, still leaving a balance of nearly one and a half billion dollars of overdue, unpaid interest, which, added to the principal, made their total indebtedness to our Government, on that date, nearly eleven and a half billion dollars. This huge sum equaled about half the total of our outstanding Liberty and Victory Bonds, and the interest on it at the Liberty Bond rate of 4¼ per cent. amounted to about five hundred million dollars per year.

Could we have collected from the Allies what they owe us, the proceeds would have enabled us to pay off and wipe out half our Liberty and Victory Bonds, and cut about five hundred million dollars from the annual interest charges that we have to meet. But none of the Allies could raise the requisite hard cash for present payment of the principal of their respective debts, and most of them were making rather a poor showing in the matter of interest payments. The situation was complicated, delicate and becoming unpleasant. France had made large, and England still larger war loans to the lesser Allies before we entered the great conflict; in fact, until then Great Britain had been the financial mainstay of the fifteen or more nations banded together against Germany and her associates in the war, and they owed her enormous sums, but all Europe was so close to bankruptcy that there was no near, and perhaps little ultimate prospect of payment of these inter-ally war debts. Therefore, when, after waiting for nearly four years for Europe to adjust itself, our Government intimated to the Allies that it would like to have the war debts owed to the United States "funded" (meaning a definite arrangement by each debtor nation to pay its debt in regular installments within a time certain, and meantime meet its interest at stated intervals), England and France, the two largest debtors to the United States and at the same time largest creditors of the smaller nations, proposed that all the inter-ally war loans be treated not as debts, but as contributions to a common cause, and offered to cancel all war loans made by them, provided America would consent to do likewise with the war debts owed to her.

It was somewhat embarrassing for us to decline this proposal, as they argued that it was no more than fair inasmuch as they had sacrificed and suffered so much more than we in the war. And our refusal, though entirely proper and justifiable, on the ground that the imbroglio started over there because of jealousies and conflicting interests in which we had no concern, and that we were drawn into it despite our best efforts to avoid trouble and keep out, was regarded in Europe as having prevented a general cleaning of the slate of inter-ally war debts. But Congress, reflecting the prevailing sentiment of our people, held that these loans, made to the Allies at their urgent, almost frantic solicitation, and in reliance on their promise to pay, ought to be liquidated as soon, and in such manner as the financial condition of the respective debtors would admit.

Great Britain, though owing the largest amount, accepted our decision as final, and met the situation manfully by sending commissioners to Washington, early last winter, to arrange the terms for "funding" the British war loan. This is the more creditable in view of the fact that a large part of the British loan was for the benefit of other members of the great war coalition, and was used to pay for products purchased by them in America at high war prices. The terms of "funding" agreed upon in conference of the British and American commissioners, and promptly assented to by the British government, and accepted in behalf of the United States by Congress shortly before the close of its recent session, are in substance as follows:

Accounts and interest were adjusted to December 15, 1922, which was selected as the "funding" (settlement) date. Adding interest at 4¼ per cent., and deducting previous payments amounting to more than a hundred million ($100,526,379.69) dollars, and crediting a further immediate cash payment of more than four million ($4,128,379.69) dollars, made the balance owed exactly four billion six hundred million ($4,600,000,000.00) dollars, for which last-named amount, British Government bonds are to be issued to the United States Government. This principal sum is to be paid in annual installments. Beginning with a payment of twenty-three million dollars the first year, these installments increase each year regularly in accordance with a fixed schedule whereby the final installment of one hundred and seventy-five million dollars, payable the sixty-second year, will complete the payment of the debt. The bonds are to be dated December 15, 1922, and bear interest payable semi-annually on June 15 and December 15. The interest rate is to be three per cent. during the first ten years, and three and one-half per cent. thereafter until final payment. The British Government is accorded the right to adopt three-year payment periods, consolidating the installments accordingly, or, at its convenience, to pay larger installments and take up the bonds at maturity, or during the first five years to defer payment of half the interest and add it to the principal to bear interest until paid. But in any event the entire debt must be paid within the specified time, and the present expectation is that it will be taken care of long in advance of maturity.

In order to be in financial condition to accomplish these results the British Government has, since the war, reduced its army to the minimum of safety, and cut down its naval expenditures, while the British people, who must necessarily bear the burden, are doing their part by submitting to very heavy taxes to raise the money wherewith to pay the nation's creditors and sustain the national honor. It is a shining example which other European countries, that are piling up debt for the support of excessively large military establishments instead of trying to arrange for the funding of their war debts, would do well to follow.

Italy, indeed, since the recent advent of the Fascisti to power under leadership of Mussolini, has largely reduced expenses by cutting down her army and navy, and discharging thousands of unnecessary government officials, with the avowed purpose of beginning to pay her national debt. Our war loan to Italy, including accrued interest, is nearly two billion dollars, and it is hoped that within the present year she will "fund" it on terms similar to those on which the British settled.

France owes our Government nearly four billion dollars and is letting us do all the worrying about it; for while the unpaid interest on it is piling up she is running recklessly in debt for the support of the largest standing army in the world (excepting possibly that of Russia), and has committed herself to an ambitious and extravagant program for naval expansion, and is getting dangerously involved by her operations in the Ruhr district, which threaten to plunge her into another war with Germany. France owes for next to the largest war loan made by our government, and there seems to be little, if any, prospect of her "funding" it while bent on her present militaristic career. Stuffy little Belgium, whose war debt to our Government amounts to nearly half a billion dollars, is a side partner with France in the Ruhr enterprise, the purpose of which is to enforce payment of the war indemnity due them from Germany. Of course Germany ought to pay, but is this the way to get the cash, or is it more likely to get trouble? Opinions differ. Our Government kept out of this trouble by bringing home our watch on the Rhine.

Other Billions the World Owes Us

WHEN the World War broke out in August, 1914, we were, as we always had been, a debtor nation. At that particular time our foreign obligations exceeded three billion dollars. This statement is not to be understood as signifying that our Government owed any such foreign debt, for our total national debt at that time was only a trifle in excess of one billion dollars, represented by Government bonds, which were very largely held by our own people. What is meant is that more than three billion dollars' worth of American securities, including Government, State, county, municipal and corporation bonds as well as corporation stocks, were owned abroad, mostly in England, France and Germany. As Europe became pressed for money during the war, these securities, to the value of three billion dollars, were returned to the United States and sold, so that foreign holdings of American bonds and stocks are now comparatively small, and we have risen to the position of a large, if not the largest, creditor nation in the world. A brief survey of what the world owes us is interesting.

Besides the eleven and a half billions loaned by our Government, individuals and monied institutions in the United States have invested about eight billion dollars in foreign credits and securities. These private investments include commercial credits extended abroad to the amount of three billion dollars; bonds of foreign countries, four and a quarter billion dollars, and foreign paper currencies, bought on speculation, five hundred million dollars. The bonds and paper money of some of these countries have so depreciated in value as to have already caused heavy losses to the American holders of them. The world owes the American people, private investments and Government loans combined, a total of about twenty billion dollars, of which some is unquestionably good, some practically worthless, and a considerable part doubtful.

A propaganda in favor of canceling our Government's war loans is being industriously spread by certain foreign trade and international banking interests in this country. American houses engaged in foreign trade believe that such a relief measure would benefit them by increasing their business and by making it easier for them to collect the three billions of foreign credits owed to them. The international bankers, who deal in foreign credits and foreign bonds, see that such sacrifice on the part of our Government would strengthen the credit of these debtor countries and make a better market for their bonds. The holders of foreign bonds favor the project in the expectation that it would enhance the value of their securities. In opposition to the proposal to cancel the foreign war loans, Secretary of Commerce Hoover, who is a member of the Allied Debt Commission, truly says: "These loans are, in fact, debts owed to our tax-payers." We are being taxed to pay the interest on them, now, and, if the debtor nations are released, we shall have to be taxed to pay the principal.

Brownie's Triumph

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

"Where did you get these?" he asked in great surprise.

"Pray what is the meaning of this affecting scene?"

He colored, wrung her hand and shut the door.

Copyright, 1879-1880, by Street & Smith.
Renewal granted to Mrs. Georgie Sheldon Downs, 1907.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Brownie Douglas, waiting at Memorial Hall, Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, is joined by her friend, Aspasia Huntington, a wealthy Baltimore belle, who meets with a slight accident in her dress, attracting the attention of two gentlemen, Adrian Dredmond, an Englishman, and Mr. Gordon who recognizes Brownie, she being an intimate friend of his sisters. Her father, dying before she is born, and her mother at her birth, she is adopted by her great aunt, who gives her her name Mehetabel and brings her up to remember she is a direct descendant from the Scottish nobility. Her nurse calls her Brownie from the first. Adrian Dredmond, stepping upon something, picks up a costly cuff button with a large D, studded with brilliants, and the word "Brownie" in finest letters upon the back. That night Miss Mehetabel Douglas tells Brownie the story of her life, her betrothal to Lord Denforth, the ball given by Helen Capel's aunt, Lady Rexley, her introduction to Count de Lussan, a man of questionable reputation, her refusal to accept a dance at Lord Denforth's command, Helen Capel's treachery in suppressing a note, her serious illness, her coming to America, where her father and mother soon died. She gave Brownie her jewels, including her engagement ring, coral cross and all other gifts from Lord Denforth, and when she is gone she requests her to take the chain and key from her neck and wear it as long as she lives. That night she dies and upon the reading of the will Mr. Conrad, who has the care of her aunt's property, admits using and losing money entrusted to him, leaving Brownie, after all debts and legacies to the servants are paid, two hundred dollars. Refusing Mr. Conrad's offer to relieve her from anxiety and leave her home with him or go with Miss Huntington as her companion, she secures employment in New York, trimming hats. The work hard, she is helped by Mattie Bentham who wins her love and together in the public library Brownie, reading to her in French, attracts the attention of an elderly gentleman who kindly asks if she is a teacher and speaks any other language. Learning she is musical would she be persuaded to teach. If the opportunity presented itself she would and mentions Ware and Coolidge where she is employed. His card, given to her, bears the name of Wm. H. Alcott, M. D. Brownie, called to the office, meets Dr. Alcott, who has recommended her to his son-in-law, Mr. Coolidge, as being competent to superintend the education of his two younger daughters and to be a companion and interpreter on a proposed trip to Europe. Requiring references, Brownie mentions Mr. Arthur Conrad who satisfies Dr. Alcott; they were classmates. Going to the Coolidge home, Mrs. Coolidge and the eldest daughter Isabel admit her personal charms but are jealous of her beauty and many accomplishments and hope her meeting Wilbur will be avoided. The wish fails and Wilbur is determined to know her better. Boarding the steamer, Brownie is saved from an accident by Adrian Dredmond. Wilbur relieves him of further care and takes her to his mother and sister who realize Wilbur's infatuation for Brownie. Adrian Dredmond, standing near, overhears their determination to prevent Wilbur's further attention. Going to London they take a house near where Miss Mehetabel lived. Wilbur buys tickets for the opera for the family and insists that Miss Douglas shall go, too. Selecting her dress and jewels, among which is a coral cross, Mrs. Coolidge is surprised to find her so radiant and decides it shall not occur again. Adrian Dredmond entering the Coolidge box, is introduced to Brownie and while Isabel monopolizes his attention, in leaving he escorts Brownie to the carriage, where she receives insults from Mrs. Coolidge, and Isabel, who, envious of Brownie's elegant dress and jewels, queries to her mother Brownie's honesty. Seeing her go for a walk, Isabel enters Brownie's room and securing her jewels takes them to her mother, who requests that Brownie, upon her return, be sent to her. She asks Brownie if she has anything in her possession not legally hers and accuses her of stealing jewels and clothing. Brownie questions her right to accuse her, to enter her room and from under lock and key take her jewels and demands the return of the casket. Mrs. Coolidge refusing, Brownie threatens legal measures for their return.

CHAPTER XVI.

DECLARATION OF LOVE.

WHILE Brownie was weeping out her misery alone, and trying to plan what was best for the future, Isabel Coolidge and her mother were examining, more at their leisure, the beautiful ornaments, which had so excited their admiration and astonishment and which they both began now to covet.

Isabel tried the effect of each separate piece upon herself.

To do the two women justice, they really believed that the jewels had been stolen.

"Mamma, this tiara of opals, pearls and diamonds will be just the thing for me to wear next Wednesday night at Lady Peasewell's; see how becoming it is." And Isabel turned from the mirror, where she had been catering to her vanity for the last half hour.

"It is lovely, my dear; but I doubt whether your father will be willing you should wear it. His ideas are peculiar, you know."

"He won't be here, mamma. You know he said he should not be home for a week or ten days; so he need know nothing about it."

"I am at a loss to know whether it is best to tell him anything about this affair," said Mrs. Coolidge musingly.

"But what excuse will you give him for bouncing Miss Douglas?" asked Isabel, who had a taste for using slang once in a while.

"Her insolence to me ought to be a sufficient reason, I think," her mother answered, flushing as she recalled the governess's keen shafts and haughty manner.

"No one knows anything of the matter but you and I; why not keep still about it?" urged Isabel eagerly.

"My only fear is, that she will take the law, as she threatened, and then your father would have to know about it. Besides, he will be very angry at the way we gained possession of them, and then there will be no end of trouble."

She very well knew that if that day's doings became known to her honorable husband he would insist upon her returning the casket to Miss Douglas, and tell her that she was meddling with what was none of her business.

She began to fear that she had been rash in pursuing the course she had, and she heartily wished that Isabel had kept her meddlesome fingers at home. And yet, every time her eyes rested upon the glittering wealth with which her daughter was toying, the desire to possess them became stronger.

"Pshaw!" returned Isabel, "she'll never dare take the law, and if she does, who will believe her, providing the jewels cannot be found, and we are very much astonished and indignant at being accused of taking them from her."

The two women gazed at each other in silence for a moment.

"Isabel, you would not dare do such a thing—it would be stealing and lying," said her mother, in a whisper.

"Oh, no, mamma; you are too conscientious altogether," returned the girl, shrugging her shoulders, and trying on Miss Mehetabel's beautiful engagement ring at the same time. "We both agree," she went on, "that they have already been stolen, and we only take possession of them for a little while, until we can find the true owner. I'm sure I would give them up at once if we could find the person whom they belong to. Of course, if we should acknowledge that we have them in our possession we should have to give them up, and, whether Miss Douglas proved her property or not, we should lose them. At any rate, let us hold on to them, and wait a while to see what she will do."

"I am afraid it will not do for you to wear them, Isabel; you may meet the very person to whom they belong, here in London."

"So much the better, then, mamma; we shall know that we did right in taking them from Miss Douglas, and can make our explanations and restore them. It strikes me that my suggestion is a very wise one after all," concluded the artful girl, who was determined to keep the jewels.

"You may be right, but I don't feel exactly easy about the matter; above all things, don't let Wilbur know anything about it," returned Mrs. Coolidge, fearing more and more that there might be trouble ahead for them.

"No, indeed, mother, and, as I began this business, I'll take charge of these jewels, and you need know nothing about them, if your conscience is troubling you."

Isabel replaced the jewels in the casket, shut it, and, with a laugh, started for her own room.

As she opened the door, which had stood ajar ever since Brownie went out, she encountered Wilbur, face to face.

She would rather have faced an alligator at that moment.

"What is it you don't wish Wilbur to know, and what jewels are you talking about?" he smilingly demanded as he barred her passage.

He had come up just in time to hear their last remarks.

"That is my secret," she replied, trying to turn the matter off playfully, though her heart was beating like a trip-hammer.

"Are they in that box? Let me see."

Before she hardly knew what he was about, he had taken it from her and opened it.

"Where did you get these?" he asked in great surprise.

"They are borrowed," Isabel replied, giving her mother a significant look.

"Borrowed! Who could lend such a valuable collection as this?" he asked, beginning to feel, from their appearance, that all was not right.

"Ah!" he added, with a start, after he had examined them more carefully, "here are those ornaments which Miss Douglas wore the other evening. Do the others belong to her, too?"

They saw that it would be useless to try to keep their secret from him, and little by little he drew it all from their reluctant lips. A more indignant mortal never trod the earth than Wilbur Coolidge when he got at the truth of the matter.

He demanded that the jewels be returned at once to Miss Douglas, and a suitable apology made for their insulting treatment of her.

An angry scene ensued, which Mrs. Coolidge finally put an end to by coming forward, taking the casket from her son's hand, and locking it within her husband's safe, which stood in the room.

"Now, Wilbur, be so kind as to hold your tongue," she said angrily, "you have made a fool of yourself with this girl. I intend to keep these things until your father returns, and see if he believes a poor governess came by these things lawfully."

"You women are regular tyrants, and I reckon when father does return there will be a different state of things," he replied with flashing eyes.

"Oblige me by dropping the subject, my son; you are interfering in what does not concern you in the least," returned Mrs. Coolidge coldly.

"I shall make it my business, madam, mother mine, just as soon as the law will allow, if the poor, abused darling will let me," he muttered as he angrily left the room.

He watched for Brownie to come down all the evening, but she remained in her own room, too utterly miserable to desire to meet any one.

Viola and Alma inquired for her at tea time, but were told that she was indisposed, and would not come down.

Viola afterward stole up-stairs with a cup of tea and a tempting plate of cold chicken and toast, but Miss Douglas's door was locked and she could not gain admittance, so she was forced to take it back again to the dining-room.

The next morning Mrs. Coolidge and Isabel started off on a shopping expedition, and as the carriage drove from the door Wilbur rang the library bell and desired the servant who appeared to ask Miss Douglas to grant him a few moments' conversation. The young man was pale and excited, and after the servant disappeared he walked the floor nervously.

Brownie soon came down, looking haggard and wan, her usually bright eyes heavy and lusterless and great dark circles underneath them.

Wilbur hastened forward to meet her as she opened the door.

"My dear Miss Douglas," he said, flushing deeply, "I do not know what to say to you, but I am more indignant than I can express at the treatment you received yesterday."

Brownie smiled wearily, though her lips quivered at his kindly words. It was so comforting to be treated civilly.

"Can I do anything for you, Miss Douglas?" Wilbur asked eagerly, his heart deeply touched by her sorrowful appearance.

"Thank you; I do not suppose it is in your power to do the one thing I wish—give me back my jewels, for they are mine, Mr. Coolidge, notwithstanding it seems improbable for a poor girl to own such valuables," she replied, her color rising.

"I do not doubt it in the least," he answered, impulsively. "I know that you are truth and purity itself, and, believe me, you shall yet have your own."

"Ah! can I?" she interrupted, her face lighting up with its wonted beauty for a moment.

Oh, how he loved her! and how it thrilled him, that any words of his should have power to make her beautiful countenance brighten like that.

"Yes, you shall have them again," he said. "I cannot restore them to you today, but just as soon as my father returns I shall acquaint him with what has happened, and he will see that justice is done."

"Thank you," Brownie said, appreciating his kindness, yet fearing that his mother and sister would outwit him and influence his father against her.

"I feel deeply mortified," he went on, dropping his eyes, "that any one who is akin to me should be guilty of doing what my sister did yesterday; and the treatment which you afterward received there can be no excuse for it."

"Do not speak of it again, Mr. Coolidge; it is past and cannot be recalled. Your kindness and sympathy have lightened my heart already; and as I go away, it will be a comfort to know that I have your esteem and friendship."

The young girl was deeply touched by his sympathy and distress.

"Go away! What do you mean?" he asked, looking up startled.

His mother had not told him that she was going away.

"Surely you do not think that I would remain where my truth and honesty are called in question?" she replied with dignity.

"Where will you go?" and his brow contracted with pain.

She could not stay; it were folly to think of it, he knew.

But it was like taking the sun from the heavens to have her go.

"I do not know," she said with a sigh, and her tone, so sadly sweet, moved him to his very soul.

She had been with them less than three months but during that time she had grown to be the one woman in the world to him.

He had learned to watch and live upon her every motion and expression, to listen eagerly for her footsteps and even the soft rustle of her clothing. The lightest sound of her voice, her very presence, thrilled him as nothing else had ever done before. He had lived a new life since her coming. He knew he was a better man for it.

She had stirred into being new motives and purposes, and he was beginning to think of forsaking this idle way of living, and of trying to fit himself to be useful in the world and worthy of her.

And now she was being driven away like a criminal, and insulted by his own kin.

If she should go away thus, with this dreadful cloud hanging over her, what would become of her? Who would take her in?

His pulses throbbed wildly; he grew desperate with the thought.

"You do not know? Will you let me tell you where to go?" he breathed, bending eagerly toward her, his face flushing hotly, and his eyes glowing with the wild love which moved him.

She looked up a little surprised by his manner, and her clear eyes fell before his passionate gaze.

"Darling," he cried, seizing her little hands, "you do not know where to go?" Come to me. My dear, my dear, you do not know how I have learned to love you since you came like a ray of light into this household. Come to me, Meta—be my wife, and no stain shall touch you; they shall not dare to breathe aught against you; place your little hand in mine, and I will plant myself between you and all harm. My love, my love, I have found you. I have seen many fair women, but now I have found my fate, the sweetest fate man ever found. Say, dearest, will you be my wife?"

She sat before him white, and still, and dumb.

"Brownie, you do not answer me. Will you not crown my life with the blessing of your love? They shall never harm you. We will go away where they cannot trouble you by so much as a word. Will you not speak and give me hope?"

She drew back from him, pained and sorrowful.

"Mr. Coolidge, if I speak at all, it must be to crush all hope of any such thing as you desire," she said sadly, with downcast eyes and crimson cheeks.

"Meta! Miss Douglas! no!" he cried, hoarsely, his handsome face clouding with pain.

"Yes, Mr. Coolidge; hard as it is for me to wound you thus, when you offer me the greatest homage a woman can ever receive—the love of an honest heart—yet I cannot bid you hope, for I do not love you in return."

"You have not had time to think of it. I have startled you with my abruptness; you do not know your own heart yet," he said, his lips growing white and quivering.

"I have not, indeed, had time to think, for I did not at once imagine that you cherished any such feelings toward me. But my heart does not respond to yours. No, Mr. Coolidge, I cannot be your wife."

"Are you sure—are you very sure you can never love me, Meta?" he pleaded, while great drops came out upon his forehead.

"Quite sure," she said firmly, though kindly.

"Brownie, Brownie, when I love you so, when I have listened eagerly for the sound of your footfall; when even the tone of your voice has been music to me from the first; when every fiber of my being has twined itself about you! Oh, it is too cruel; I cannot have it so—only give me a little ray of hope, and I will wait years, if need be."

His voice sounded like the cry of the lost as he caught his breath with a hard, dry sob that made the young girl's heart ache with pity for him.

She arose from the chair where she had been sitting, and the great tears rolled swiftly over her flushed cheeks.

"Mr. Coolidge, be assured if I could truthfully speak the words you wish, I would do so; but it cannot be, and as it will only give us both pain to meet again, let me say good by to you now, for I go this evening. Please accept my thanks for your kindness to me, and let me still be your friend."

She held out her hand to him and he took it, his whole frame shaking with the great storm which well-nigh crushed him.

He lifted it to his lips, then broke down utterly, and with one quick movement gathered her close in his arms and pressed his lips to her white brow.

"My darling, my darling," he groaned, "leave me, but you can never know the wretchedness of this moment to me."

At that moment the library door swung open, and Mrs. Coolidge and Isabel stood upon the threshhold.

CHAPTER XVII.

JEALOUSY.

With a feeling of utter dismay, Brownie disengaged herself from Wilbur Coolidge's embrace and started to leave the room.

But the two women barred the way, and would not let her pass; while Mrs. Coolidge demanded in stern tones:

"Pray, what is the meaning of this affecting scene?"

Wilbur colored deeply, but braced himself for battle.

"Mother—Isabel—let Miss Douglas pass," he commanded, in a voice as stern as Mrs. Coolidge's own.

They dare not disobey him in that mood, and moving aside, Brownie passed out and sped swiftly to her own room.

"Now I will answer your questions, if you have any to ask, the young man said, folding his arms and regarding them with a gloomy brow.

"I should like to know how that designing girl succeeded in trapping you into making such a fool of yourself?" said Isabel furiously.

"Really, Isabel, you are acquiring an elegance of speech at which I am surprised," returned her brother sarcastically.

"Wilbur, hush! Isabel, keep quiet," said Mrs. Coolidge authoritatively. Then turning to her son, continued:

"I am astonished, my son, at what I have just witnessed. That girl will ruin the peace of the family yet."

"She has ruined it already, as far as I am concerned," he replied moodily; then added:

"But, mother, Miss Douglas is in no way accountable for what you saw. I alone am to blame. I had just asked her to be my wife——"

"What!" exclaimed both women, aghast.

"Yes; I began to love that beautiful girl the first moment I saw her. Further intercourse has only served to deepen and strengthen that sentiment, and today I resolved to ask her to be my wife, that I might shield and protect her from further insult and abuse on your part."

"Indeed!" said his mother, growing white with anger.

"When is this wedding to take place between you and this lovely beggar?" sneered Isabel.

"I warn you not to try me too far, either of you!" Wilbur replied, with a dangerous gleam in his eye; then added:

"You did not permit me to finish my statement. However, I have only to tell you that Miss Douglas has refused me."

His mother heaved a sigh of intense relief, and murmured:

"What an escape!"

While Isabel retorted:

"Showed her good sense for once! She probably knew she would not be received into a respectable family after what occurred yesterday. You always were a fool when there was a pretty face around."

"Thank you! But be it known to you both that if she had so chosen, I should have made Miss Douglas Mrs. Wilbur Coolidge just as soon as the law would have allowed," was the stern reply.

"Now, if you please," he added, addressing his mother, "I would like you to write a recommendation for Miss Douglas."

"A recommendation for what—truth and honesty?" she sneered.

"For her thorough education and superior accomplishments, and her efficiency and success as a governess," he retorted firmly.

"I shall do no such thing," was the indignant reply.

"Then, mother, mark my words, if Miss Douglas goes away from here without a recommendation from you, as a good governess, a refined and cultivated lady, I leave this house also today, and utterly refuse to accompany you further on your tour. Is it not enough," he continued, excitedly, "that you abuse and insult her, prowling about among her possessions, and appropriating them without driving her forth herself in the future?" no means of providing for herself in the future"

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

IT would be selfish of me to take up much space when there are so many interesting letters as there are this month, and are every month for that matter. Sometimes it seems that we must have discussed every subject under the sun but something new comes up and we're off again. There are a variety of letters this month, more than usual, letters from girls married to foreigners, happy and unhappy, a letter from an Indian woman and from a little girl in Hawaii, as well as a letter on mining and another on using oilcloth for kitchen wall covering. Could anything be more diversified than that? Like the drug store clerk, "If we haven't what you want we've got something just as good."—Ed.

COLORADO.

DEAR COMFORT:

I feel that I am addressing a personal friend when I say "Dear COMFORT," for indeed you have befriended me in a way that my personal friends could not.

In January, 1922, COMFORT had about two dozen designs of applique and patchwork for quilts from which I got an idea of competing for the prize to be given at our County Fair to be staged the following September.

I emptied all my rag bags and boxes of odds and ends that had accumulated since my girlhood days back thirty years ago in old Kentucky where I was born and reared. I am not fifty-five years old. I had thought of giving all these old pieces to the wives of the pioneer settlers who had little children and telling them they could make doll clothes out of them, but you know how my heart clung to those old hat trimmings, laces and ribbons in a way I cannot explain. I well knew I could never tog up in them again but to part with them seemed hard and to keep them stuffed in bags and boxes, pushed back under the bed, seemed selfish and foolish when we needed every inch of floor space. So I said to my husband, "I wonder if I could win any of the prizes to be given at the Fair next September?" He grunted, "I speck so," and I began to sort and arrange my scraps, putting all the calico and percale by themselves, after washing and pressing any that needed it. Then I measured them as best I could to determine whether or not I had enough of the colors I wanted to make No. 17, "Old Maid's Puzzle," by Mrs. S. A. Husky, Penn. I wanted some easy pattern that I could stitch nicely on the machine for I knew I must hurry if I got ready for the fair. When the "Old Maid's Puzzle" was finished it looked so attractive that I was glad I had not had all those beautiful scraps cut up into doll clothes. I felt so good and so encouraged that I got out my bags again and selected the silk scraps for crazy patchwork which I made into pillow tops and pincushions. While working at these things I was looking after a big garden of all kinds of vegetables and hardy flowers. I also raised 209 chickens from fourteen hens and had no henhouse, just used boxes and hovers constructed of slab rock and mud. Made them myself.

Needless to tell all the details but I won a set of silver teaspoons, four rolls of burlap rooling and $10.50 cash prizes, all because of reading COMFORT. Now I am sending fifty cents for COMFORT to be sent to a friend of mine in Kentucky who has a family of six children. I am hoping she may get as much real help and solid comfort out of your good paper as I have. As a premium I want COMFORT'S New Applique and Patchwork Book, Reward No. 8731.

Success to you forever. MRS. MARY.

Three cheers for Mrs. Mary. Who can beat her record? How has COMFORT helped you?—Ed.

MRS. Lizzie Lawley of West Frankfort, Illinois, wins the COMFORT Sisters' Pin this month with her "ways with rhubarb." They are such appetizing ways that I am sure you will agree with me that the pin belongs to her, though I did wish I could award more than one. Every month the recipes get better and better; by "better" is meant more exact, and easier for the inexperienced cook to follow. Don't copy recipes from a cook book but tell in your own way exactly how you make a certain dish and give the exact quantity of every ingredient. Maybe you'll get the pin next month.—Ed.

DATE BREAD.—Sift two cups of flour with two teaspoons of baking powder and three-quarters teaspoon of salt. Rub in two tablespoons of butter. Wet with sweet milk until the dough is soft and spongy. Do not add all the liquid in one place nor at one time, but pour in a little here and there as it will require less stirring and facilitate getting the right amount. Do not knead but with lightly floured hands make in a ball and then press into a long inch thick shape. Cover with clean pitted dates, roll and bake in a hot oven.

Ways with Rhubarb

RHUBARB PIE.—One and one-half cups of rhubarb, cut fine, one cup sugar, yolks of two eggs, and two teaspoons flour. Mix all together, bake with an undercrust; when done, frost with meringue made from whites of eggs, beaten to a stiff froth with two tablespoons of sugar. Put in oven until delicate brown.

RHUBARB-RAISIN PIE.—Mix three cups chopped rhubarb, one cup chopped, seedless raisins, one-half cup cracker-crumbs, one-half cup good molasses, one and one-half cups sugar, one teaspoon butter, one-quarter teaspoon salt and spices to suit taste. Bake between two crusts. Enough for three pies.

RHUBARB AND PRUNE SAUCE.—One-half pound prunes washed thoroughly and soaked two hours in the water in which they are to be cooked. Put them over a slow fire and simmer until tender, then add one-half cup sugar. Cut into small cubes enough rhubarb to make one pint, add to the prunes and boil until tender. If not sweet enough, add a little more sugar.

RHUBARB SHORTCAKE.—Make a shortcake pastry by sifting together two cups of flour, three tablespoons baking powder, one-half teaspoon salt. Mix with these dry ingredients one-half cup butter and lard mixed, and one-half cup cold milk. Bake in layers or cut out like biscuit. Split open and fill with following mixture: One cup chopped dates or pineapple stewed with one pint of chopped rhubarb and sugar to sweeten to taste. —MRS. LIZZIE LAWLEY, West Frankfort, Box 829, Ill.

RHUBARB ROLL.—The crust. Two and one-half cups flour, one teaspoon baking powder, one and one-half teaspoons salt, sifted together. Work into this three-quarters cup of lard, add enough water to make a stiff dough. Roll half of this dough to about one-eighth of an inch thick and the length of your bread pan which it is to be baked in. Over this put thin slices of rhubarb to cover dough, sprinkle one cup of sugar over rhubarb, dot with pieces of butter and add a little nutmeg. Roll, crush ends together and place in pan. Make two of these. Over these put one cup of sugar mixed with two tablespoons of flour, a little nutmeg, according to taste, and a bit of butter. Over all pour enough boiling water (be sure it is boiling) to cover rolls and bake thirty minutes or until crust is browned. There will be enough sauce to serve over when it is done. Try it. It is fine.—MRS. HARRY WILLIAMS, New Castle, 2103 Walnut St., Indiana.

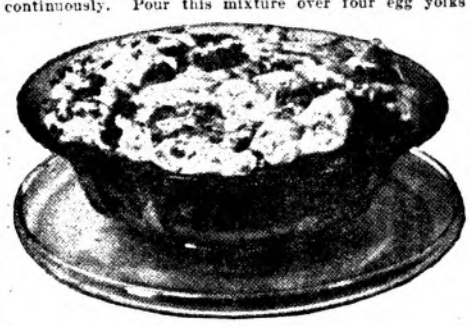
RHUBARB AND FIG MARMALADE.—Two and one-half pounds rhubarb, one pound of figs, one pound of sugar, two and one-half cups corn syrup, juice of one lemon and pinch of ginger. Wash and cut rhubarb into small pieces. Do the same with the figs and put them in bottom of preserving kettle, put rhubarb on top and cover with sugar. Let stand over night. Next morning cook until clear, about fifteen minutes, add syrup, lemon juice and ginger. Boil until thick.—DODA, North Dakota.

SPICED RHUBARB.—Wash and cut up two and one-half pounds of crisp rhubarb and put in a preserving kettle with three-quarters cup of cider vinegar. Cover with two pounds of sugar into which is mixed two tablespoons cinnamon and one-half teaspoon each of ground cloves and ginger. Add the chopped rind of one large orange. Bring to boiling point and let slowly cook until it is thick. Store in sterilized glasses and seal with paraffin. —MRS. W. H. GARDINER, Portalnd, R. R. 19, N. Y.

CHEESE AND MACARONI.—Boil until tender two cups of macaroni in salted water. Drain and put in a buttered baking dish, alternating layers of macaroni with grated cheese, with layer of bread- or cracker-crumbs on top. Pour over this enough sweet cream to cover. Place small pieces of butter on top and put in oven. Cook until almost dry. Serve hot.

DEVILED EGGS.—Boil six eggs twenty minutes, place in cold water and remove shells. Cut in halves and remove yolks, taking care that white is cut in two pieces only. Mash yolks, add one teaspoon melted butter, season with salt, pepper and mustard and a little celery salt, if one likes it; moisten with a few drops of vinegar and stuff into whites, fastening the two halves together with a toothpick. These are fine for picnics or make a nice dinner dish, if placed on lettuce and served with salad dressing.—DAISY WHITEMAN, Salem, W. Va.

TOMATO MINCEMEAT.—Two and one-half gallons of sliced tomatoes. Let set over night and drain off water next morning. There will not be much to drain. One pint of apple vinegar, six pounds of brown sugar, one nutmeg, one tablespoon each allspice and cinnamon and two teaspoons salt. Let boil until thick then add two pounds of raisins and seal in sterilized jars.—MISS MINNIE SNODDY, Wartrace, Tenn.



BEAN AND BEEF STEW.—Wash one cup red kidney beans and soak over night. Try out one or two ounces of diced salt pork, cut one pound of beef into small pieces and brown it with one sliced onion in the salt pork fat. Add one cup canned tomatoes and enough water to cover and simmer gently for three hours. —MABEL LELAND, Santa Monica, Calif.

POTATO AND HAM CROQUETTES FROM LEFTOVERS.—One pound of minced ham, two cups mashed potatoes, salt and pepper to taste, and one-half cup dry bread-crumbs. Make balls of ham and potatoes, roll in crumbs, dip in beaten egg, roll in crumbs again and fry in deep fat.—MISS PEARL LEAS, New Albany, 2302 Shelby St., Ind.

MACARONI WITH EGGS.—Cook macaroni in salt water until tender. Drain and turn into frying pan in which some fat has been placed. Break several eggs (the number depending upon amount of macaroni used) into the macaroni, season with salt and pepper and stir all together until eggs are done.—MRS. LEE VANDERHOOF, Ada, Mich.

BRAN BREAD.—Two cups sour milk, one-half cup white sugar, one teaspoon soda, one teaspoon salt, two and one-half cups white flour, two cups bran, two teaspoons baking powder, two tablespoons melted lard, one egg. Put in small pans, let raise four hours. Bake in slow oven one hour.—CAROLINE BETTS, Grey Eagle, Minn.

PEACH SOUFFLE.—Drain one can of peaches, saving the syrup to use in the sauce. Cut the fruit into eighths and place in the bottom of baking dish which has been well buttered. Melt three tablespoons of butter in a saucepan, and smooth in one-quarter cup of dry flour, then gradually add one cup of hot milk, stirring continuously. Pour this mixture over four egg yolks that have been beaten until very light with one-third cup of sugar and one-third teaspoon of salt. Beat the mixture and set aside to cool. Fold in the egg whites that have been beaten until dry and then pour onto the peach. Bake in very moderate oven about 35 minutes.

SAUCE.—Thicken the peach syrup with a little cornstarch and while hot add a little butter and sugar to taste. When cool, beat in one tablespoon of lemon juice. The souffle must be served as soon as taken from oven.

TOASTED CHEESE SANDWICHES.—Cut loaf bread into slices nearly half an inch thick, and then into squares or fancy shapes, saving the trimmings for bread pudding. Make each sandwich of two slices of bread with a thin slice of cheese between. Place in large shallow biscuit pan that is well buttered. Moisten each top slice of sandwich with a little hot milk and sprinkle lightly with salt and a dash of cayenne pepper. Top each with three small pieces of butter. Bake in a hot oven until the cheese is melted and the tops browned. Serve at once.

FRENCH CUSTARD.—One quart of sweet milk, one-half cup of sugar, two eggs and one teaspoon flavoring extract. Put milk on stove and bring to scalding point but do not boil. If boiled it will curdle when flavoring is added. Break eggs, separating yolks from whites. Beat yolks and add sugar. Beat well and add to scalding milk. Scald until it thickens, set aside to cool, then add flavoring. Beat the whites of eggs to stiff froth, add two tablespoons of powdered or granulated sugar, put on buttered dish and set in oven to brown. Slide off on top of custard.—MRS H. J. GERLING, Epping, N. Dak.

SPANISH CHOCOLATE CAKE.—One cup sugar, one-half cup butter, two eggs, one-half cup sour milk with one teaspoon soda in milk, two cups flour, vanilla, and one-half cup boiling water mixed with one-half cup cocoa. Mix as given and bake in moderate oven.—OPAL JESTER, Medicine Lodge, Kans.

SMELTS WITH PIQUANT SAUCE.—Dress smelts, leaving the heads on. Cross the heads and tails and hold with toothpicks. Drop into deep hot fat and cook to a golden brown. Small-sized smelts may be cooked in this way, but larger ones are rolled in fine cracker-crumbs, then in equal parts of egg and water slightly beaten together and in crumbs again. The sauce is made as follows: Melt two tablespoons of butter, smooth in two tablespoons of dry flour and one-third teaspoon of salt and stir until it is bubbling, then slowly add one cup of hot water. Stir and cook five minutes, then add one tablespoon of cut-up sour pickle, half a teaspoon of made mustard, a little chopped parsley and one-half teaspoon of vinegar. Use cold.

ASSORTED CAKES.—Cream one-half cup of butter with one and one-half cup of sugar until smooth and light. To this add the well-beaten yolks of three eggs and one teaspoon of vanilla. Sift together three scant cups of sifted flour, one-half teaspoon of soda and one of cream of tartar and sift again. Measure one-half cup of milk and add this alternately with the flour to the butter mixture. Beat hard and when smooth add the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs. Drop into round gem pans and bake in a moderately hot oven.

For marbled cakes, take one-third of the dough and color it with grated chocolate and a little cinnamon. The addition of half a cup of finely cut dates rolled in flour will make date cakes, or chopped walnut or pecan meats make a delicious nut mixture. Raisins and spice will make another variety. Dried and grated orange peel, and a teaspoon of lemon juice in place of the vanilla gives a delicious flavor to plain cake.

SOFT CARAMEL CUSTARD.—In a saucepan put three tablespoons of granulated sugar and stir until it is melted and becomes a dark amber color. Cool and add to the well-beaten yolk of three eggs and one-half teaspoon of salt. Have ready one pint of milk brought to the boiling point in a double boiler. Pour part of milk into the egg mixture, stir and return to remainder of milk in boiler, and stir constantly until it thickens. Care must be taken not to cook the custard until it curdles, which will occur if cooked a few seconds too long. When smooth, and thick enough to coat the spoon, its own heat after taken from the boiler will finish the cooking. Should the custard overcook, at once remove from boiler into a cold dish and with the egg beater beat vigorously until smooth. Flavor with one-half teaspoon of vanilla when thoroughly cold. It is best when made the day before using. Fill glasses with custard and top with the beaten white of egg sweetened and mixed with a little shredded cocoanut.

ORANGE MARMALADE.—Quarter and slice one dozen thin-skinned navel oranges. To this add double the quantity of water that you have of oranges and let stand over night. In the morning boil until tender. Let stand ten or twelve hours and then add an equal quantity of sugar and let boil slowly until it thickens. Just before removing from the fire, add the strained juice of four lemons. Pour into jelly tumblers and seal.

GINGERBREAD.—A pinch of salt, one cup of corn syrup, one or two eggs, one cup of sour milk, two teaspoons of cinnamon, two teaspoons of ginger, one teaspoon of allspice, one teaspoon of cloves, one teaspoon of nutmeg, one cup of sugar, one-half cup or one large tablespoon of butter, two small teaspoons of soda dissolved in one cup of boiling water, and enough flour to make the batter fairly thick. Bake in a slow oven for forty-five minutes or an hour.—MISS SHIRLEY MATSON, Neola, Iowa.

COCOANUT DROPS.—The white part of a cocoanut grated. The whites of four eggs well beaten, half-pound sifted white sugar; flavor to taste. Mix all as thick as can be stirred. Lay in heaps an inch apart on paper in a baking tin. Put them in a quick oven, remove when they look yellowish.

ROAST STEAK.—Have one round steak cut one-half inch thick. Dredge with flour. Have ready three onions, sliced, one-half cup celery, one-half cup carrots, all salted to taste. Place this mixture on steak, roll and sew with strong thread. Place in roaster with olive oil (one-fourth cup), or strips of bacon, over it, and one cup of hot water. Let cook until tender.—RHEA, Jacksonville, P. O. Box 375, Alabama.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you make room for a ranch girl? I've listened to you for a long, long time and now I'm going to join you.

I am just a plain old country girl. I live away out in the mountains on a ten thousand acre ranch and it gets lonesome here sometimes. I have been keeping house for father the last three months while mother is staying near school with the children. I stayed here all alone for four days and nights while father was gone, but didn't get lonesome as I had plenty of work to do during the day. When night came I was tired and would go in and go to bed and it wouldn't be long until I was in dreamland. Some nights I would go to sleep listening to an old owl, up in the canyon, calling "Who-oo, or a fox or something else barking over on the mountain, but every morning the old rooster would wake me and I was still where I was the night before.

I'm some brave girl, don't you think, but most anyone can be brave when they have to be. How many of you like to ride horseback? I do and I ride a great deal in the pastures with father when he needs someone to help him, and the boys are gone. I saddle my horse and go with him and he says I make as good as any of the boys. I can rope a goat or sheep and doctor it for screw worms or run a gasolene engine, or do anything else that is to be done on a ranch. I have lived on cattle, sheep and goat ranches all my life and I don't think there is any place like a good old ranch. Maybe it is because I never knew any other place. I am a lover of Nature and always happiest when I can saddle my horse and ride out over the green hills and look on the mountains where the sheep and goats are grazing and then ride down on the creek where the beautiful, clear water makes its way from among the rocks. There's where I jump off my horse, pull the bridle off his head and hang it around his neck, and lie down in the grass and listen to the birds sing. I wonder if there is another girl like me in the whole world. I'd like to see her. I would be glad to get letters from some of the Western ranch sisters, boys and girls, as I get lonesome at times. I would appreciate it very much if the sisters would send me a small piece of silk for my quilt which I've started.

I am five feet, nine inches tall, have dark brown hair, blue eyes and a sunburned complexion.

Best wishes to all. GEORGIA JACKSON.

It's not fair, Georgia, getting me unsettled like this, just when I was nicely under way with the Sisters' Corner, too. Another letter like yours and I'll be covering my typewriter and getting out into the fields somewhere and communing with Nature my own self.—Ed.

NIOBRARA, NEB.

DEAR MRS. W. AND SISTERS:

Here comes an Indian sister from the West. Now sisters, don't hold your breath and think I am anything but a true American. We Indians are all well educated in the different Government Industry Schools. We farm like the white men, raise hogs, keep cattle and have the nicest flock of yellow buff Orpingtons. I enjoy raising chickens, but when Mr. Rat makes a meal of one I enjoy setting a trap and making short work of him.

COMFORT is the dearest paper ever published and is all that its name implies. I have been a reader of it for a long time. A neighbor used to loan me the paper and later I subscribed for it. Now I wouldn't be without it. Husband thinks the Sisters' Corner is a make-up but I want him to think and know differently.

I am the mother of four little youngsters, two boys, aged ten and six and two girls, one four and a half years old and baby sister, five months old. We are a happy family.

I like the pretty things described in COMFORT. They are all easy to make. I do different kinds of fancy-work.

Mrs. H. Moyer, I can sympathize with you if your health is broken down and with five boys to care for. I have only two and it keeps me busy to keep them clean and in school. I don't think anyone will ever judge your character by the condition of your house but will be glad to call again with a cheery greeting.

Will describe myself as all the sisters do. Am five feet, six inches tall, dark eyes and have big feet and big willing hands, ever ready to work.

With best wishes and regards to everybody,

An Indian sister, MRS. ANDREW JONES.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL:

It has been a year since I tried to get in. At that time I sent a snapshot of my little Louise.

I will tell all of my neat summer kitchen, as it will soon be housecleaning time.

I painted the room white. It was a small room with one door and one window. Under the window I put shelves, and on the top shelf I had some potted flowers. The lower shelves were for my aluminum kettles and pans. Then I put in my kitchen cabinet, side table and wash-stand. These I painted white with a coat of white enamel. My linoleum was blue and white, tile pattern and with white sash curtains and my oil stove I had a neat little kitchen at little expense.

Here's how I look, brown hair, grey eyes, weigh 150 pounds and was thirty-six years old the 20th of March. Would like to get birthday letters and cards. Have been married twenty years. Married young, did I not? Have five children, two boys, nineteen and seventeen, and three girls, fifteen, twelve and five, so you see I have had my hands full but they are lots of help now.

A COMFORT reader for fourteen years.

MRS. LOU GIBBONS.

Mrs. Gibbons.—I am sorry that the snapshot of Louise could not be used, but only clear photographs reproduce well. Snapshots cannot be used.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been reading the discussion in our corner on American girls marrying foreigners. Not until I read the letter from A Western Wild Rose did I decide to write. I expect many more like hers will follow while those like myself will keep from writing as I did. I don't blame them for it is hard to tell of our mistakes, but conscience won't let me keep silent. You know,

"A bird with a broken pinion saved another from the snare;

And the life which sin had stricken, saved another from despair."

I am "the bird with the broken pinion" and by writing my experience I hope to save another from the snare.

I am an American girl and a few years ago, when scarcely more than a child, I married a foreigner, many years my senior. I believe now that we both secretly regret it. I long for a life partner of my own nationality and I know he would rather have one of his own country women for a wife. My husband is all right and I am all right, but our ways are as different as black and white.

I have had the opportunity of observing many marriages between American girls and foreigners and not one of them have ever turned out happily. I think the main reason for this is that foreigners do not have the same regard for women that Americans do. They usually regard a wife as a servant or a slave. They are not always cruel to their wives but they are kinder to wives of their own nationality than those who are not, but they do not reverence womanhood as Americans do.

Another thing, not many American girls are robust enough to do the hard work that foreigners require of their wives. Their own country women are and they believe it is their duty. I weigh but one hundred and twenty-three pounds and have almost ruined my health by working hard when I was unable to even be out of bed. But my husband did not think that it was too much for me. I have been doing all of my own housework, including washing and scrubbing, when each of my babies were two weeks old.

The American girl who marries a foreigner will have a great many things to learn. Of course there are exceptions but one is running a great risk to do it. I am speaking of what I have observed to be the rule.

Girls, when selecting a husband demand an American one, there's none other just as good. If you will but notice it, foreign women will marry an American man if she gets the chance. They always say, "Americans are so much kinder to their wives than our men." I have heard them wish that they might have won an American husband. That ought to make American girls think twice before throwing away their chance of marrying a son of America.

To "A Foreigner" who wrote some time ago, I would say that foreigners are those born across the ocean and Americans are those born in America. My ancestors have been here since America has been a nation and I am as much an American as there is today.

Yours sincerely, LILLIAN.

FROM THE EDGE OF THE JUMPING OFF PLACE.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Help! Help me if you can and maybe in helping me you will help others who are starting out in life.

My trouble is this: husband and I don't agree at all and it is getting worse and worse. Shall we part and go different ways or what? You see, it is like this My people still live on the place they lived on when first married and they have made a beautiful home of it, after years of work and improvement. That's what I want to do, buy a place and stay there. If it doesn't exactly suit us, remodel it or change it the best we can, but husband says, "No." He thinks the only way to make money on a farm is to buy a rundown place,

A Forgotten Love

by Adelaide Stirling

Gillian sat down, dolefully, without hope.

"You'd better take it," he said; "I've got another, and you look done up."

"On what terms were you and your master?" he asked sharply.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Hamilton, born rich, dies poor, leaving two daughters, Gillian and Jacqueline, to the care of his father's housekeeper. Upon her death there is left forty pounds a year. Mr. Marchmont, in league with his butler, housekeeper and Lesard, buys Hamilton Place and is anxious to adopt both girls that he may gain admittance to the neighboring houses. Jacky refuses; she has no faith in him, and finding Gill in tears begs her not to stay if unwilling. Gill admits there was someone in London and he writes he cannot have her for his wife. She refuses to give his name. Three months later and she wonders why Marchmont adopted her and wishes there had not been the burglary at Lord Hollis's. Lesard, in love with Jacky, will care for her. If alone she would marry him, but she must go to Gill, who is unhappy. Lesard warns her not to go—it is no place for any woman. He does not explain but asks her to trust him. Mrs. Gibbs, the housekeeper, engages a new maid, Mary James, who is Jacky in disguise. Gill confesses her fears that Marchmont is an impostor and cautions Jacky to avoid him, and Jacky knows Lesard is right. She remodels a velvet dress sewn with amethysts for Mrs. Gibbs, who tells Jacky she is to accompany Gill and Mr. Marchmont to Sir Simon Wellford's, where there is to be a grand party. Jacky, that night, hearing footsteps, and a whistle which reminds her of Lesard, listens, and with shoes in hand steals down the stair-case and spies three men, Marchmont, a stranger and Lesard, and hears from him, "here's luck to the ball." With his words, "Promise to trust me whatever happens," ringing in her ears, she gets Gill ready for the visit and at Lady Wellford's has a room next to Gill's. Sir Charles Vivian takes Gill into dinner. The masked ball follows and Gill smuggles Jacky in dressed in a white domino, where she recognizes Lesard in the guise of a monk and fails to make him reveal his identity, leaving her baffled. Following him and Gill in search of Jacky, they see the robbery and rather than make an outcry Gill admits he is her husband. With the guests at supper a robbery is committed. Mrs. Fareham's jewels, her grace's, too, are missing and only Gillian's jewel case left. Detectives arrive and Sir Charles Vivian's statements, as to his movements before the dinner, relieve him and Gill of suspicion. Requesting to see her maid and how she forgot the jewels, Gillian admits she was sick in bed and knew nothing about her not wearing them. The robbery breaks up the party, and Jacky, packing up, asks Gill what they are to do. It's done. If Gill tells all she knows she may find out Lesard is married before, and Jacky reads his last letter to Gill, and while loathing the man whom she believes has wronged both, she knows they are not strong and brave enough. Marchmont insists that Gillian shall appear at dinner and Jacky requests her not to ring, she is to sit with Mrs. Gibbs, and late in the evening she slips down-stairs, opens a door, standing behind it. She recognizes the voices of Lesard and Brookes and the latter calls "All clear," and she sees Marchmont, Brookes and Lesard who is bringing the jewels, which he carries in his belt, the stones removed by Marchmont and Lesard laying the canvas belt in the place uncovered. Struggling she gains the passage back, her hands bleeding. Gill meets her, hurrying her to safety and Jacky hears Brookes query why Lesard goes out the other way and what will prevent his coming back and taking it. Gillian goes to walk with Sir Charles Vivian and is joined by Jacky. She admits Jacky is her sister. Jacky discovers a flash of light. She has found the other way and someone is coming out from an opening in the wall which is well concealed by ivy and at the foot is a deep dark pool. It is Lesard. Jacky crawls in—the stones are undisturbed. Going out, she hears Gillian call, "Marchmont is back." He has seen the detective. Unless Lesard fails him he is safe. Gill and Jacky decide to get out at once. Jacky means to take the jewels. Lesard decides to have his share and starts for Hamilton Place. Jacky finds the jewels and is staggered by the weight. She fastens the belt around her body. In the collection is a necklace of stones clear and black. Not daring to have them in her possession, she wraps them up, putting them back, and piling the stones over them. She hears someone coming. It is Lesard. Brookes, suspicions of him, goes with Marchmont to the cellar where he meets with an accident. Lesard, unconscious of Marchmont's presence, secures the black diamonds. Marchmont asks what he is doing and finding the belt gone grasps Lesard and feels a package under his shirt. He denies having the belt but something better—the black diamonds. Marchmont declares he has never touched the belt and if Lesard will put the necklace back he will share with him. Lesard attempts to leave. If he moves, Marchmont threatens to kill. There is the sound of a leap and Marchmont is dead. Jacky, kneeling beside him, leaves a bloody print of her left hand. The sisters make their escape.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE WRONG ROAD!

"JACKY!" Gillian said. "There's no sign of a village. Can't we sit down and rest? I'm so tired!"

Jacky looked at the weariness written on every line of the white face.

It was daylight and raining still, as if the deluge that had slopped down prodigally all night had not wet them to the skin. How far they had walked she did not know, but they were in a country road on each side of which was a high wall covered with ivy. Behind were woods, the game preserves of some big estate.

"We can't sit down by the roadside! We'd get stiff, and catch our deaths." She shifted the bag she carried from one hand to the other, as if it were very heavy. All night they had carried it between them, but now they were taking turns with the intolerable weight of those jewels, and even the thought of the horror left behind them could no longer hurry them. Wet, miserable, hungry, they lagged and crawled along the interminable road, but now they stopped and looked at each other.

They were done, tired out; there was no use in disguising it! And even supposing they were already nearing a railway station, dared they show themselves there, soaked to the skin, wearied out, and staggering under the burden of a small, black bag that had no right to be so heavy?

"There might be tea at the station," Gillian said childishly. "Aren't you hungry?"

Jacky nodded. The bare thought of hot tea and a station bun nearly made her cry; hunger and fatigue made her almost forget that the night before she had looked on murder.

"Get out the map!" she said.

Gillian took it from her sodden coat pocket, all wet and clammy, so that it tore as she opened it.

There were two roads marked on it, where the straight road branched some six miles from Hamilton Place. The right-hand road ran on not quite the same distance and struck the railway at the little junction of Bamford; the other—Gillian gasped.

"Jacky, we've taken the wrong turning in the dark! We've come by the lower road instead of the upper. Look!" She held the limp rag of paper and pointed with her finger. "We would have been at Bamford by now—oh, long ago! We would have caught the train to London—the night local waits there to catch the express."

Jacky stared, following Gillian's tracing finger.

"And this road—the one we're on—how far does it go?" afraid to look at the length of the waving black line.

"It's thirty miles from Hamilton Place before this road strikes Fulchester, a good big town." A swelling in her throat made her hoarse. "You see how it winds! We must have come fifteen miles, for we've never stopped a minute—and we can't do another fifteen without a rest. What are we to do?" shifting from one weary foot to the other.

"There must be villages—farms!" Jacky said, sick with disappointment.

Gillian shook her head. There were plenty, but not on this road, which wound between parks and estates. To strike across country on either side of them would mean a five-mile walk.

"They're too far—for me, anyhow," she said with shame. "And I never looked last night because this road wouldn't concern us—but, for all I know, we may be near some big house where they'd know me. I used to drive miles to pay visits with—him!" significantly. "Once we went nearly to Fulchester. Oh, why didn't I take more care at the fork of the roads?" despairing tears in her eyes.

"Don't cry, Gill." Jacky could bear anything if only Gill would not cry. "We'll have to do the best we can. After all, perhaps people will notice us less in a big place like Fulchester than at a little country junction."

"If we ever get there," shivering forlornly in her wet clothes. "I—I don't think I can go on."

"Just a little farther, Gill!" trying to think her own head was not dizzy nor her limbs aching. "We might get to something."

"Not for ten miles or so, this is a sort of back road, don't you see? These are different people's shootings on each side of us."

Gillian put the nearly destroyed map into her pocket choking down a sob because Jacky looked so tearless, so wild and dreadful with the face bleach all washed off by the rain except in the hollows at her temples and round her eyes.

"Give me the bag," she said bravely enough. "It's my turn."

But Jacky only shook her head and dragged on with it. She was sick with remorse, shaken with futile regrets, as well as weary. Why had she not gone to that London detective with the secret that weighed her down, instead of trying to manage the world herself? Marchmont might have been "a devil incarnate," but for all that his death lay at her door. If it had not been for Gillian she would have run like a hunted fox—but Gillian's nostrils were pinched in at each breath she drew; Gillian was trembling and stumbling as she walked. The long days in Marchmont's gilded prison-house had made her soft and delicate; her very recklessness of last night was telling on her.

Jacky set her lips and stumped on. Did these walls stretch for miles? Why were men allowed to have so much ground for themselves when people were crowded into city slums? The dirtiest gipsy-camp would have been a godsend—except for the jewels! Those heavy, dragging things meant that they must not dare to stop if they met gipsies, but march on past fire and food. The stolen jewels had grown to be a trust to Jacky Hamilton. Her honor was bound up with them; she would fight for her life to get them restored.

She glanced with hatred at those high walls on each side that seemed to hem them in. Suppose even now they were suspected, followed! They would be caught helpless, for they could never climb those walls. She stopped short with a little, stifled cry.

The left-hand wall still stretched onward unbroken, but on her right hand was a rusty iron gate, small and unused. She ran to it and peered through the bars.

Inside was a narrow, overgrown cutting that had once been a path, and now was choked with withered grass and weeds. She could see nothing along it, and yet a senseless hope of shelter woke in her mind.

The gate was bolted and fastened with rusty wire.

"I don't think it leads anywhere" Gillian said, looking through it. "What are you going to do?" Jacky, handing her the bag, was climbing over.

"Wait for me," she said painfully, for the effort made her shaking limbs feel powerless. "I'm sure there ought to be a lodge. If there's a keeper I'll get something for us to eat."

She disappeared in the soaked underbrush, and Gillian sat down dolefully, without hope, on the bag, without the vaguest remembrance that she was sitting on a stolen fortune. She would have given everyone of the senseless stones for dry clothes and rest. They were only a terror and an agony to her. But the second she sat down she knew she had been mad to do it, for she could not get up again; she was too dog-tired. With a feeble wonder what the time was, she leaned her head against the gate and closed her eyes. It seemed as if long ages passed before she heard Jacky's footsteps over the soft sound of the unceasing rain.

"Did you get anything?" she cried, for Jacky's face was almost happy.

"Give me the bag and come," she said. "No, I didn't get anything—I did better. Gill, there's an empty house there! No one can have been in it for months. It's not a keeper's lodge, but a deserted hut they must use for shooting-luncheons once in a while. And now the shooting season's over I don't believe there's a soul within miles. Hurry, it's getting late! Some one might be coming along the road."

Gillian fell scrambling from the top of the gate, but she was too dazed to care. Rest and shelter she must have or die out there in the road. She followed Jacky blindly till they came out on a grassy space. A little, rustic hut stood there, built for occasional use. The door was not locked, and Jacky dragged Gillian in.

"Look!" she said triumphantly, in spite of her weariness. "We can stay here all day and go on to Fulchester after dark."

Gillian collapsed on the floor and gazed about her in utter thankfulness.

The hut was but one room, with no furniture but some chairs and a long locker. But there was a fireplace, where old ashes yet lingered, and, seeing her look at it, Jacky told her great tidings.

"The locker is half full of firewood," she said, almost crying with relief, "and, oh! Gill, in one end there are some potatoes. And we're so hungry!"

"I'm afraid of the fire. Some one might see the smoke!" But Gillian said it weakly.

"They couldn't see it from the road, and no keeper or any one else is likely to come here in this rain. Anyway, we've got to risk it."

She was building the fire as she spoke, thankful for that tiny box of matches that had never been taken out of her pocket; and as the flames caught the dry wood and roared up the chimney the two girls drew close to the hearth, while outside the rain drummed gently on the roof—rain that was helping them, if they had known, by washing away every trace of their small, telltale footprints.

The potatoes they baked in the coals were old and not too good, but they did not mind that.

One by one they dried their gripping garments by the glowing heat of the wide fireplace, till at last they sat dry and warm.

Deadly weary, Jacky roused herself from a doze. She was drunk with sleep, but she could not get last night from her mind.

"Gill, when you came down from the cellar last night, what did you mean to do?" she asked suddenly.

"I don't know," half-asleep. "I thought you might be dead down there, and I didn't care what happened to me. But, oh, Jacky! I've spoiled it all by mistaking the way last night," she sat up, wide-awake.

"I don't think it matters. We would only have gained a day. Go to sleep, Gill," gently.

Gained a day! Surely some angel must last night have led them by the hand. If they had but known it, to have reached Bamford Junction, would have been to be put into the only second-class carriage—with Lesard!

And Lesard would not have been likely to let that heavy, black bag pass unnoticed, even face to face with his discarded wife—his sweetheart of a day! Little Mrs. Fareham had good cause to thank Heaven for that mistaken road; but Jacky Hamilton could not know all that wrong road meant to her. Love and life, and a great happiness would have met her at Bamford Junction; and balanced against them only the stolen jewels and Gillian's future.

In ignorance she lay by the fire, her world a wreck, her prayer only to endure to the end. But she must have slept, for presently she felt Gillian shaking her.

"It's time to go," she said. "I had a dream. Oh! a dreadful dream—that some one came and found us. There are some potatoes left. We can eat them as we go."

Jacky looked at her old silver watch. It was time, indeed, if they were to catch the night train. She paid small heed to Gillian's dream; after last night she would have been made of iron not to dream.

"Yes, we'll go," she returned, and the stiffness of her tired bones frightened her as she rose. Could she ever do a mile, much more fifteen?

But she looked at Gillian's haggard face and held her tongue.

The rain had ceased, but the road was deep in mud. Their clogged feet weighed like lead as they tramped on in the deepening dusk, yet, somehow, step by step, they drew away from the doom that was following them.

More dead than alive, walking mechanically, keeping from stumbling by their wills alone, they got into Fulchester about eleven o'clock. And there fate dealt them kindly cards.

There had been an excursion to the first spring race meeting at Fulchester, and the trains was packed with uproarious excursionists. The threatening, expostulating guard had no time to notice the two exhausted passengers, huddled into a third-class carriage with a crowd of half-drunken men. He was just able to see that they had tickets, and rush away to make a futile effort to clear the first-class carriages.

Their bag between them, they huddled into a corner.

The carriage was full to overflowing of noisy, laughing, smoking, drinking out of flasks. Only one looked at the two girls, and he was amiably drunk, having had a glorious day.

"Have a nip?" he said generously to Gillian, who sat next to him. He pushed a silver flask nearly into her face.

She shook her head.

"Better! Look as if you'd had a bad day," he remarked, not the least put out. "Too proud, eh? to drink another chap's liquor? I'll give you the flask, then. I feel like giving away something. Catch! It's your own," and he tossed a small flask into Jacky's lap. "You'd better take it," he said; "I've got another. And you look done up."

Gillian, flushing angrily, would have given the silver toy back, but Jacky's hand caught her wrist. The man would never miss the flask, and it might mean everything to them.

"That's right!" he commented approvingly. "Never let a good thing go by." Have a sandwich? and he threw a greasy package to Jacky. Before she could thank him he had turned away, his drunken kind-heartedness forgotten. But he had put new life into their veins.

As the train rolled into the London station it suddenly remembered them.

"Want a cab? See you to a cab!" he insisted, and hustled them out into the lighted desolation of the great station, where they were swallowed by a throng of excursionists, who swept by the barriers like a tidal wave.

"Easy does it!" cried their officious friend, and with a dexterous hand on the back of each slim waist he ran them out through what was all but a free fight.

"Run, Jacky, run!" Gillian panted, as they were pushed out into the open street. "I saw that man there!"

She dragged Jacky away as she was thanking their burly ally.

"What man?" Yet she knew without waiting for the answer.

"The detective—who dined with Mr. Marchmont—that night," wildly. "He couldn't be looking for us?"

"Did he see us?" Jacky's heart stood still.

"No; they pushed him down and hustled him, but I saw him quite well."

"He wouldn't be looking for us," said Jacky. Her lips felt queer and cold. Marchmont must have died! Lesard, her lover—Gillian's husband—would swing if Gill and she had to witness against him!

"Run, Gill!" she cried in her turn, and never dreamed that it was not Lesard for whom the detective was watching the station!

CHAPTER XIX.

THE TELLTALE MAP.

"What!" said Sir Charles Vivian. "Murdered—Marchmont?" Lady Wellford wrung her hands where she stood in the village street.

"He was found dead—in his own room," she cried tragically. "Oh, Sir Charles! And it might have happened to any of us—to me! I'm going to close our house at once and go to London. I don't feel safe here. Oh! that poor, misguided girl!"

What girl? Was the woman crazy?

"Don't you know?" She stared at him. "She's gone—Gillian Hamilton—and they are afraid she did it."

"Did what—shot him?" with angry derision.

"He wasn't shot, he was stabbed! He was simply drained of blood, Simon says," shivering. "And Gillian and her maid were gone. Their beds had never been slept in."

"You don't know what you are talking about, if you'll pardon my saying so." He was suddenly so stern that she winced. "No girl could stab a man like Marchmont, and she involuntarily was terrified of him." He could have sworn at his slip the minute it was out.

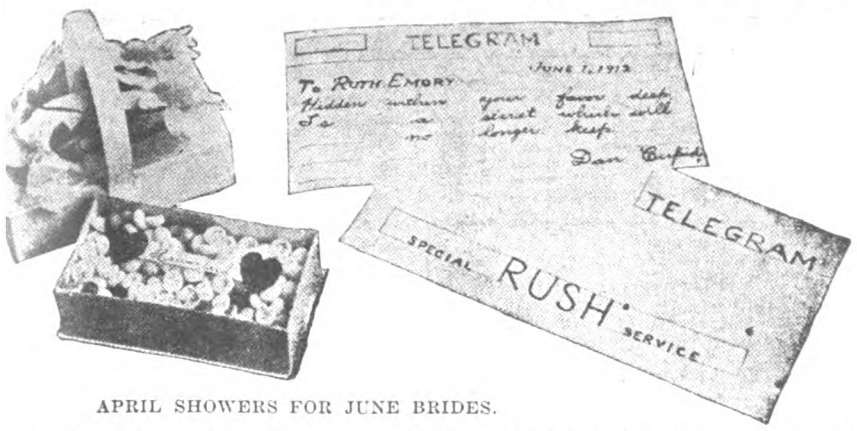
"Terrified! I thought they were on the best of terms!"

"So they were, for all I know," he amended coldly. "But her stabbing him is all rubbish. You are a much stronger woman than Miss Hamilton, and I'll lay odds you couldn't stick a carving knife through a piece of roast beef, let alone a living man. Where's Sir Simon?"

"At Hamilton Place," icily. Her ladyship was furious. "The poor housekeeper is nearly frantic. It seems she was devoted to him."

"I dare say," but he was on his horse and yards away from Lady Wellford before he said it, hurrying to Sir Simon at Hamilton Place. There was some mistake about Gillian, he knew. Surely by this time she was back. He jumped off his horse at the great doorway, and the spring wind fluttered in his face the yards of crepe that hung from the door-handle.

"Miss Hamilton?" he said stupidly, as Brookes opened the door.



"We don't know where she is," Sir Charles said the man stolidly, though the visitor saw his face was lined and drawn till he looked an old man.

"She's gone, and her maid, too. It's a dreadful house, sir—my poor master."

There was nothing out of the way in either his manner or his looks, and yet the keen, blue eyes bent on him saw a something they did not like.

back into the room will find herself followed by the string of packages.

A Company Dinner

POTATO SOUP.—Cook together three medium-sized potatoes sliced, half a cup of finely cut celery, and half an onion thinly sliced, in water to cover. When soft, press the vegetables through a strainer and return to the water they were cooked in, or they may be left whole. Melt three tablespoons of butter in a saucepan, and gradually work in two tablespoons of dry flour. When blended add two cups of milk gradually and then the vegetable mixture, and enough more milk to make about six cups of soup. Flavor with salt, a dash of cayenne pepper and a little paprika. Cook about two minutes after it begins to boil. A sliced green pepper with seeds removed can be added, if desired, just before serving.

NOODLES.—Beat one egg slightly, add one-half teaspoon of salt, and flour sufficient to make a very stiff dough. Turn out on floured board, using as little flour as possible. Knead, cut and toss until smooth, then roll as thin as possible without the dough breaking. Do not disturb, but cover with a thick cloth half an hour. Now roll the dough and cut it into as thin slices as possible. Unroll the slices and dry on the board. Cook twenty minutes in boiling salted water as you would macaroni. Or, it may be cooked in thin soup stock. Add to a meat fricassee.

TONGUE WITH VEGETABLES.—Use a good-sized fresh beef tongue, cover with boiling water and after it begins to cook, set it back where the simmering point will be mantained two hours. Remove tongue from water, peel off the skin and trim the roots. Place in a deep cooker, and surround with one small carrot, one small onion, two stalks of celery thinly sliced, and one-half cup of tomato. Cover with a sauce made as follows: Melt one-third cup of butter and stir into it one-third cup of flour that has been carefully browned in the oven. Gradually stir in the water in which the tongue was cooked. There should be about one quart. Season with salt and pepper and cook five minutes before adding to tongue. Cover closely and bake one and a half hour in a slow oven after it begins to slowly simmer.

DANDELION GREENS.—Remove dead leaves, long stems and blossoms. Trim off most of the roots and soak one hour in many times as much cold water as you have greens. Change water several times, always skimming out the greens so to leave the grit undisturbed at the bottom. Add boiling water gradually as the cooking begins, so not to have too much water after shrinking. Drain by skimming into a colander. Chop, reheat with salt and butter. Serve with vinegar or lemon juice.

NEW CABBAGE SALAD.—Select a small, hard cabbage such as are found in early spring. These are sweet and tender. Cut in quarters and soak in lightly salted cold water until crisp. Drain, and with a sharp knife shave as finely as possible, as the success of the salad depends on this. Have ready a dressing made as follows: One tablespoon of butter melted then mixed with three-fourths tablespoon of flour, a dash of cayenne and about one-eighth teaspoon of salt. Stir and cook until smooth, then gradually add one-half cup of cream. When thoroughly cooked, remove from fire and beat. Cool. Just before serving beat in a little lemon juice.

EGG MUFFINS.—Two cups of sifted flour sifted twice with four even teaspoons of baking powder, one-third teaspoon of salt and one and one-half tablespoon of sugar. Beat one egg well, add one cup of milk and two tablespoons of melted butter and stir into the flour mixture. The butter may be omitted and the cup of mixing made of milk and four tablespoons of heavy sweet or sour cream. Bake half an hour in muffin tins well buttered.

CORN-STARCH PUDDING.—Mix three tablespoons of corn-starch, one-eighth teaspoon of salt and one-half cup of sugar. Wet with one-fourth cup of cold milk. In a double boiler have two cups of scalding milk and one square of chocolate melted. Gradually add the corn-starch mixture and cook until it thickens, then add one-half teaspoon of maple flavoring. Pour into a mould to set. Serve with sugar and cream.

Timely Recipes

PINEAPPLE WITH VARIOUS COMBINATIONS.—This delicious fruit deserves all the popularity it enjoys, for it is appetizing and refreshing, contains nourishment, and when eaten either raw or cooked at the close of a hearty dinner will act as a digester. When the pineapple season is at its height housekeepers should take advantage of the low price to buy freely for immediate use and for canning.

SLICED PINEAPPLE.—With the left hand hold the pineapple firmly by the top leaves and pare with a thin, sharp knife. With a pointed knife, remove the eyes. Lay the fruit on its side in a large platter, cut away the stem end and then cut the whole into half-inch slices. Cut out the centers. In a glass serving dish arrange the slices with a sprinkling of sugar according to the sweetness of the fruit.

CANNED PINEAPPLE.—The fruit may be prepared in slices, the slices cut into cubes, or it may be put through the food chopper to be used in fancy drinks and desserts. If chopped, it should be handled rapidly and the sugar, which should be one-half its weight, added at once. Put into jars at once and cook 30 minutes. In canning the sliced or cut-up pineapple, fill the jars to the shoulder with fruit and then to overflowing with a syrup made of equal parts of water and sugar. Cook 30 minutes.

PINEAPPLE SALAD.—Four cups of pineapple cut into small cubes. Cover with one-half the weight of sugar that there is pineapple, and let it stand several hours with one-half pound of marshmallows cut into fourths or smaller. Drain. Make a dressing as follows: Beat two eggs thoroughly, add one teaspoon each of flour and sugar well mixed, then one cup of pineapple juice and three teaspoons of lemon juice. Beat well with the eggbeater and cook in double boiler until it thickens, stirring constantly. When cold add one cup of whipped cream. Arrange pineapple and marshmallows in the center of a shallow salad dish, surround with small leaves from heart of lettuce, pour over the dressing and sprinkle with eight tablespoons of broken pecan meats.

SALAD COMBINATIONS.—Sliced pineapple, orange, cottage cheese, lettuce, dressing.

Diced pineapple, banana, nuts, apple, mayonnaise dressing.

Pineapple, canned or fresh pear, lemon juice, lettuce, mayonnaise.

Sliced pineapple, strawberries cut into halves, banana, lettuce, sweet salad dressing.

PINEAPPLE-ORANGE MARMALADE.—Wash and remove the peel from three oranges. Separate the sections and remove every bit of white peel, and the dividing-pulps and seeds. Finally shred the peel with scissors. Cover orange and peel with three cups of water and let stand over night. Cook until the peel is tender, then add one good-sized pineapple put through the food chopper. Cook slowly half an hour, add five cups of sugar, or more if desired, about one-third cup of raw almonds that have been blanched and ground, and cook slowly from one-half to an hour longer.

Other Seasonable Recipes

BANANA CROQUTTES.—Peel and scrape the banana and cut off the ends. Make a beaten mixture of one egg and four tablespoons of milk. Roll the banana in this until completely coated, then roll in fine bread-crumbs. Fry in deep fat.

ESCALLOPED BANANA.—Two cups of fine, soft bread-crumbs mixed with one-third cup of melted butter. Butter a deep baking dish, cover the bottom with crumbs, then with sliced banana, repeating until all is used, with crumbs on top. Over the top pour the juice of one lemon, cover and bake 20 minutes in a hot oven. Remove the cover and brown. Serve with a sauce made as follows: Cream one-fourth cup of butter until very light, gradually add three-fourths cup of powdered sugar, then alternating two tablespoons of sweet milk and two tablespoons of orange or pineapple juice, only a very little at a time. Beat hard.

GRAPEFRUIT BASKET WITH STRAWBERRIES AND CAKE.—With a sharp fruit-knife cut a grapefruit basket shape. Remove the pulp, pick it apart, discarding any of the membrane. Select ripe strawberries. Cut in halves and mix in equal parts with the grapefruit. Sweeten to taste and let it stand one hour. Fill the baskets and serve. Other fruits may be added.

WHITE CAKE.—Cream one-fourth cup of butter, gradually beat in one cup of sugar and add one-half teaspoon of vanilla. Sift one and two-thirds cup of flour with two and one-half teaspoons of baking powder and alternately add it to the butter mixture with one-half cup of milk. Beat until smooth, then fold in the whites of two eggs beaten stiff and dry. Bake in shallow tin about half an hour in an oven a little above moderate heat.

CUP CAKES WITH VARIED FROSTINGS, AND FILLED PASTRY.—Beat the yolks of two eggs until very thick, then gradually beat in one-half cup of sugar, then add a little over one-third of a cup of hot milk, one-fourth teaspoon of lemon flavoring, one-half cup more of sugar, one-fourth teaspoon of salt, the two egg whites beaten stiff and dry, and one cup of flour sifted with two scant teaspoons of baking powder. Beat until smooth and bake in gem tins in a moderate oven.

UNCOOKED FROSTING.—Beat the whites of two eggs until very stiff, gradually beat in one and one-half cup of confectioner's sugar, add two tablespoons of boiling hot water, and one-half teaspoon of vanilla. It is well not to add the last half tablespoon of water at first, as difference in size of eggs causes the amount of liquid to vary. If too thin more sugar may be added.

WHITE ICING.—In the top of a double boiler put one cup of granulated sugar, four tablespoons of cold water and the unbeaten white of one egg. Keep the water boiling continually, and beat with a Dover egg beater until the frosting takes definite shape when the beater is lifted. Take from fire and add one-eighth teaspoon of salt and one-half teaspoon of vanilla. Continue beating until firm enough to spread without running.

CHOCOLATE FROSTING.—In a bowl over the teakettle put two squares of chocolate, one level teaspoon of butter, three tablespoons of hot water, and stir until melted. Cool and stir in enough confectioner's sugar to spread. Flavor with vanilla. Sprinkle with ground nut meats for variety.

LEMON CREAM FILLING.—Mix together one cup of sugar, two tablespoons of corn-starch, a pinch of salt, two beaten egg yolks, rind and juice of one lemon, then add one cup of boiling water. Stir and cook until thickened. When cold, fill baked pastry shells. Whip the two egg whites until stiff, stir in two tablespoons of sugar and spread over tops. Brown in a slow heat.

Household Hints

Use vaseline for dressing russet shoes.

Use turpentine to take out paint spots.

Use salt and vinegar to clean brass ornaments.

Use turpentine to clean nickel-plated ornaments.

Use turpentine to clean and brighten patent leather.

Use a horsewhip to beat your carpets, draperies and rugs.

Use hot vinegar to remove paint from window glass.

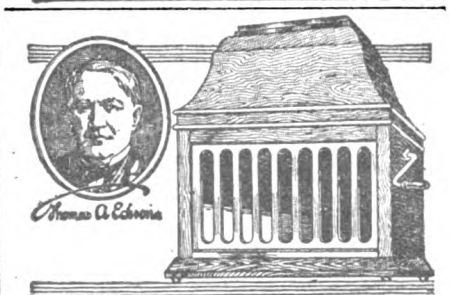
Use a little aqua ammonia in the water when cleaning paint.

Use common baking soda on a damp flannel to clean silver.

Use boraxine in the scrubbing water and save time, soap, and "elbow grease."

Use newspaper in which to wrap woolen goods or garments to be laid away for the summer and moths will not trouble them.

Use a few drops of kerosene in the cleaner when cleaning wall-paper. You will be surprised at the results; the cleaner will go farther, and the dirt will be removed more easily.



Use a preparation made of equal parts of turpentine, linseed oil and good cider vinegar for rubbing your well-worn furniture. This will remove scratches and keep the furniture looking new.

They Must Like Him

Rev. E. Thompson will preach his farewell sermon on Sunday next. The choir will render an anthem of joy and thanksgiving specially composed for the occasion.—New England paper.

Cubby Bear Saves Golden-Locks

By Lena B. Ellin

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"LISTEN—what kind of a cry is that?" asked Racky Coon, holding up one paw to quiet Chirpy Chipmunk's chatter.

Racky, Chirpy, Billy Bluejay and Cubby Bear had come to the river bank that September afternoon to gather choke-cherries, which hung in ripe, black, juicy clusters.

They all heard the sound, and looked at one another in wonder.

"It is not the voice of any of our forest people—I know that!" said Cubby.

"It is coming nearer. It is on the river!" said Billy Bluejay, and flew down over the bank.

"Come, come!" he called to the others. They hurried to the river bank, and peered over.

Around a bend in the river came a little boat, floating on the current. Billy Bluejay flew to meet it, perched for a moment on the edge of the boat, then came flying back in great excitement.

"It is a child!" he cried. "All alone! And such a little one! He has no oars, and is not big enough to use them, anyway. Why do you stand there staring, instead of doing something? There is swift, rough water not far below here, and further on, the falls!"

"Oh, poor thing, he will be drowned!" mourned Chirpy Chipmunk.

"We must save him!" cried Racky Coon. "But how? You are the only one of us large enough to stop the boat, Cubby Bear, but I will do all I can to help you!"

"Oh, if Mamma Bruin were only here!" said Cubby, rather panicstricken.

"The boat is almost here," fluttered Billy Bluejay. "Be quick, or you will be too late!"

Cubby gathered up his courage desperately, and gave a sudden jump.

Down into the water he sank, and on rising, saw the boat just passing by. He caught at the end of the boat with one paw, and tried to pull himself up into it.

The child, more frightened than ever, gave a wild scream, and started for the other end of the boat. And, what with his moving, and Cubby's splashing and struggling, the little boat was overturned, and the child thrown into the water.

"A pretty mess you're making of it!" sputtered Billy Bluejay angrily.

Luckily, they were close by the bank. Racky Coon had plunged into the water, and, between them, he and Cubby kept the child's head above water, and dragged him up the river bank.

"That was a hard tussle," puffed Racky, shaking the water from his coat.

Cubby Bear was trying to lift the little one from the ground, where he crouched, wailing dismally.

"He will never let you take him home with you," said Chirpy Chipmunk. "Poor thing, see how wet and shivery he is!"

"There is nothing else to do," said Cubby. "He does not seem to know where to go, and we cannot leave him here."

The child was a tiny thing, but he used all his small strength to resist being lifted.

"Poor little Golden-Locks," said Cubby pityingly. "I would not hurt you. Oh, I wish you could understand what I say, and then you would not be afraid." Cubby persisted, patiently, paying no heed to the slaps and kicks the little fellow gave him. At last he had him clasped firmly in his arms, and started on the long walk home.

After a while the little boy sobbed himself to sleep, and then Cubby carried him more easily, though he was obliged to sit down and rest often.

At last they reached Mamma Bruin's house. The door stood open to let in the sweet September air, and in they all marched.

"Mercy on us, what have you there?" cried Grandma Bear. "Take that child back to where you got him from, Cubby Bear! You have done very, very wrong! The homes of man are the place for the children of man—not the homes of animals. We are different."

"Would you have let him go into the swift water and over the falls—such a little man, all alone?" asked Billy Bluejay. "Cubby Bear was brave and good to save him!"

"And when he was saved from the river, could he be left wet, and cold, and alone?" asked Chirpy.

"Ah, well, if that was the way of it, you did quite right!" approved Grandma Bear.

She looked with keen interest at the little sleeping face, and gently touched the curling golden hair.

Mamma Bruin came in, and they explained what had happened, talking all together.

"Poor child, poor child!" she said. "He does not belong at the farmhouse, does he?"

"Oh, no! I know all the farmhouse children," said Billy Bluejay, "and he is not one of them."

Little Golden-Locks would eat no supper. Tired out with crying, he lay on the floor, now and then sobbing a little, piteously.

After dark, he fell asleep once more, and Cubby

"WE MUST TAKE HIM HOME, SINCE WE KNOW WHERE HE BELONGS," SAID MAMMA BRUIN.

"Let me hold him!" she said eagerly. "I never saw a human child, so near, before. The pretty, pretty thing!"

Cubby started to put the little boy in her lap, but he woke, and began crying and struggling again.

Cubby put him down on the floor, and he ran to the farthest corner of the room, uttering shrieks of terror.

tenderly lifted him and laid him on the bed.

Racky, Chirpy and Billy had spread the word throughout the Pleasant Forest that a human child was at Mamma Bruin's house, and before the sun was up, the house and yard were filled with the forest people, all curious to see the little stranger.

"Be polite to him," Bunny Rabbit charged his Bunny Babies, whose little noses were a-tremble with excitement, "and answer if he [illegible] even though you do not understand what he says."

Silently they waited for the child to awaken.

Suddenly Mollie Muskrat sneezed. "Ker-choo! Ker-choo, choo!"

"I couldn't help it, Cubby Bear [illegible] to!" she apologized.

The little boy stirred, opened his eyes, looked wildly around at the crowd of [illegible]. Spying Cubby Bear, he seemed to realize he had found a friend, and held up his [illegible] be taken.

Cubby lifted him and held him [illegible] little one snuggled against Cubby's [illegible] it with both hands.

Cubby loved him. He was so dear [illegible] and so different.

Groups of the forest people stayed [illegible] ma Bruin's house all day, and [illegible] little boy was talked about by [illegible] of his eyes, like the sky, his yellow [illegible] sunbeams, the pink of his smooth [illegible] little sunset cloud. Eagerly they [illegible] comer of the strange thing that [illegible]

Along in the afternoon came Shi[illegible] flying through the air.

"Where have you been?" they asked [illegible] into Mamma Bruin's house and see [illegible] derful thing we have to show you."

It was a strange sight, indeed, [illegible] black Crow's eyes.

The little stranger child was [illegible] floor, close beside Cubby Bear, taking [illegible] from Cubby's paw with his little [illegible] and putting them one by one [illegible] mouth.

Cubby Bear smiled proudly.

"He's not afraid of me any more [illegible]

"I know that child!" exclaimed Sh[illegible]

"You—know—him?" faltered [illegible] heart sank, for he knew that he [illegible] his new treasure.

"You remember," went on Shinyb[illegible] have told you about some children [illegible] friends of mine, and feed me with [illegible] their yard. They live in a house [illegible] the village. Well, this is the small [illegible] a time he has shared his lunch [illegible] me how you found him."

"Well, well!" said Shinyblack [illegible] by had told him all about the [illegible] gerous ride on the river and how [illegible]

"That explains what I saw this [illegible] were a lot of men down by the river [illegible] and in boats, and I wondered what [illegible] ing. They were looking for this [illegible] But I cannot understand how he [illegible] in a boat! Perhaps he was with [illegible] and the boat got away from them [illegible] they could run such risks I cannot [illegible]

"We must take him home, since we [illegible] he belongs," said Mamma Bruin. "[illegible] morning will be the best time, before [illegible] folks are astir, but when it is light [illegible] him to see and know his home."

Before light in the cool September [illegible] Mamma Bruin and Cubby Bear were [illegible] their breakfast. Shinyblack Crow was [illegible] for he was to show them where to [illegible]

Cubby took little Golden-Locks [illegible] ber, in his arms, refusing Mamma Bruin [illegible] carry him.

"No, no," said Cubby. "I love [illegible] and he will never be with us again."

The walk was long, and before the [illegible] village the little boy woke, and walked [illegible] way, holding to Cubby's paw.

"See—there is his house—the [illegible] ought to know it," said Shinyblack Crow. [illegible] people are up already."

Even as he spoke, the child [illegible] and ran as fast as his little [illegible] toward the house, calling, "Mamma [illegible] mamma!"

The door was thrown open. A [illegible] out, and caught the lost little one, [illegible] restored, to her heart.

"I am glad we could take him back [illegible] by, on the way back to the forest [illegible] tively wiped away a tear. "It is [illegible] and I love him so much, I want [illegible]

Crumbs of Comfort

NOW the sunlight is deeper each day. As I pick out the sun-warm side of the street for my daily walk, I can look in fancy beyond pavement and curb and see the grass growing green by spring runs and in wet meadows. April's touch is on the earth and the response is instant. As grass and buds are answering, so it seems that we, too, must come forth anew these days and send out green shoots on our winter-released lives. "To feel the throbbing spring"—to quote Lowell—to know we are alive with that Life of which spring is a part and an expression. Lucky are those who can thrill the most to April's touch. Libraries and universities, dusty rows of books and burdened desks, suddenly seem strangely dull and useless things when struck by spring sunlight. Many books, both old and new, are as gray as the lives of the men who wrote them—foggy with doubts and cold with frosty years. They were never penned in April and are a part of the chilly sham and shadow that hang over so much of our so-called "intellectual life." It is high time for a revolt against mind—the "modern mind" and the men it makes.

For not only in the springtime, but always, I believe that we know too much and feel too little. Kind hearts are more than college degrees, and simple faith than unproven and indigested knowledge. Our relationship with our fellow-men through life must be a human one, and our world is a living mass which, in its whole aspect is a result of the contacts and relationships of man to man. In the spirit of these relationships lies the tendency and course of the world in which we live. How important is it, therefore, that our humanity, our instinct for brotherhood, our capacities for comradeship, be not diminished or killed by any over-exalting of the intellect, by any swelling of the brain and dwindling of the heart which leaves the individual crippled in friendliness, and left to hobble irritatedly and separately through life on a crutch of so-called culture.

Our whole system for the training of the young today is based upon an exaltation of the intellect as a remedy for all things and as a means of success in life. A fetich has been made of "higher education", and to this too many of our youth are unfortunately dedicated. The altar of civilization which we have built up and before which the industrial fires burn, demands slaves and priests to carry out its specialized and diverse service. Business has become a religion and success a creed. And under a thin mask the same thing goes on in the so-called professions, where the same altar is served and the same gods worshiped—less openly perhaps—but none the less faithfully. So servants of the Altar of Material Reason and members of future Rotary Clubs are supplied by our great educational institutions in liberal numbers, and college presidents compete in offering the most earnest and well-equipped followers of the faith. The over-taught, heart-stifled, conforming worshipers go out to begin life, never having learned from any of their unhappy teachers that man exists only as a very human seeker after happiness, and that to gain this his life must be lived among and for his fellows—and not above or upon them.

For the fatality is, of course, that all a man knows, all that he has been taught in his formative years to regard as true, must be used by him in life according to those standards and within the limits that his inner self may dictate or permit. Wrecking and wreckage become certain then when the life of the external world becomes all, and that of the interior self dwindles in neglect. It is out of the fullness of the heart, not the head, that a man really acts and speaks. At all crucial periods of life the brain plays but little part. A man's life, despite any degrees to his name or space won in biographies, is always a record of what he feels, never what he knows. His attitude toward life and his fellows has been a heart-dictated one. No withered, neglected inner life can ever blossom in the flower of happy living. If the heart is a wilderness, no rose will grow there. And who is educating the heart today or planting its waste places? Very few. Because parents are involved in the over-activity and complexity of our modern life and engulfed in economic pressure, too many children are neglected and are brought up with little love in the home, and their affectional life never gains proper or natural growth. It is the more easily stifled afterwards. I have read of a well-known man who was speaking of his early years. Some one said: "You must have had a good mother who trained you well." The man replied: "My mother never trained me; she just loved me." There are volumes of the greatest wisdom of life in that simple answer.

Always he has lived best who has loved most and been most loved. Always he will understand best who has loved best. A man who loves only himself has died many times. All of our modern training and ways of living tend to separate man from man, bringing consequent and sure unhappiness and evil. That man is one has been the cosmic cry of all religion, all great teachers, since the written word gives record. Division brings its penalty. Look on the faces of the world—the educated world, the cultured world—and see how many of these faces reflect any happiness and the signs of an open heart ready to beat in unison with those of its fellows. After the first youthful years, life to the masses of men today becomes an endurance test. Philosophy is engaged by libraryfuls in giving reasons for so enduring, and science in helping them to endure. Simple joy is regarded but as the possession of children and fools, and natural laughter is rarely heard from the adults of our western races. If all of man cultivated reason brings him to this, surely we need pray to be made simple.

From Plato down through history man has fabled of Utopias that would give us all a systematized and greater share of human happiness. Today our "students of scientific government" are engaged in the same baffling search. Always man has recognized that something—either little or much—was wrong, and has pondered forms and systems to make it right. As the world has become ill—and it is often an invalid—plans and institutions multiply for remedying its complaint. But nothing can cure sick society but a complete change of life, of heart, on the part of men who collectively form the ailing body of mankind. It is out of the heart, not the brain, that the true fullness of life must come. We must feel more. We must educate our hearts. There are many teachers if we turn to them. Although we may have forgotten it, there is a diploma for whosoever "dwelleth in love." Let us look forward to the City of Friends' the Democracy of Comrades, the Kingdom of Heaven, that all the Great Companions, the Great Teachers of the race have dreamed and taught. We need to listen to these and looking within, not out, for guidance, build ourselves and our world anew.

And now for the letters:

TROY, ALABAMA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Have long looked for a letter from this part of Alabama. I am twelve years old, weigh ninety pounds, and have a big brown eyes and black hair.

Troy is a little town of 2,600 inhabitants. It is situated upon a high hill, well-drained, which makes it very healthy. Has six churches, three school buildings, and one of these is the State Normal.

We are just a family of four—father, mother and one brother. We live four miles south of Troy. My brother and I—he is nine—attend the State Normal. Farming is the general occupation, raising cotton, corn, beans, peanuts, hay and cattle. This county ships lots of hogs north, Troy being the county seat of Pike.

We live at a beautiful place. Large oaks and water works. We live on the highway. Lots of people ride through here going to Florida for the winter. We have a lot of consolidated schools in this part of the county. I have been taking music three years from what is considered the best teacher in the state. I like music just fine.

The 13th of May is my birthday and last time I had a party—just inviting the sixth grade—my grade. Does anyone want to give me a card shower this birthday? If so, it will be much appreciated. Guess I better quit now.

Your little Alabama cousin,

JEWEL MAE CROWE.

Jewel Mae, I hope you mae have a happy birthday on the 13th of Mae and that you mae get a big shower of postcards. Your letter particularly interested me because you revealed the fact that it is Alabama'a county of Pike which is responsible for shipping so many hogs north. I often have wondered where so many of 'em came from, and now I know who is playing this mean trick. Jewel, I wish you would have it stopped and keep at least fifty per cent. of these hogs at home. They are too thick here. When I try to go over to New York I meet the Subway Hog. On the first of every month the Landlord Hog comes crowding fatly around. The Butcher Hog seems to think that a lamb chop is related to a three carat diamond, and a new specimen, the Book Publishing Hog, has succeeded in halving quality of paper and binding, and doubling prices. Now that I know about where these chaps come from Jewel, I shall have an embargo placed on Pike county freight at once.

It's nice you can raise peanuts on your Troy farm, Jewel Mae. If I ever own a southern farm I am going to make a specialty of growing salted peanuts. This is the only variety of peanut I care for. I should think everybody would raise these instead of bothering with the old-fashioned flat-tasting, shelly kind. And the growing of salted peanuts is not difficult. Two tons of fine table salt should be broadcasted to the acre and well harrowed in. There should be two top dressings with cotton-seed oil—the first of these when the plants are four inches high, and the second just before the vines come to blossom. Owing to the salt the young peanut plants are very thirsty and require a lot of water. Where the rainfall is insufficient, a small sponge should be attached to the base of each plant and kept well moistened. Harvesting should be done in paraffin paper bags on a dry day. I hope you will try growing at least a small patch of salted peanuts next season, Jewel, and let me know results. If you are successful I will tell you my method of raising chocolate almonds and you can put in an acre or two of these. It would be much better for you to be shipping salted peanuts and chocolate almonds north, than to be sending us those Troy weight hogs.

CALEDONIA, MISSISSIPPI.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I am a little boy ten years old and live on a farm of eighty acres. I have a dear, dear dad and mother whom I love devotedly. I have one little brother, Harry Clyde, four years old; and two little sisters, Merce Ree, six years, and Lady Geraldine, eight months. The baby is the cutest little thing you ever saw: she has two little teeth and bites us every one.

I go to a country school and am in fourth grade. My teacher's name is Mrs. Carrie West. She is a good one, too; plays base ball and basket ball with us, but she makes great big goo-goo eyes at us if we don't study. Guess she would whip us if we were naughty, but we haven't but fourteen scholars, so we do nothing but study and play.

Uncle Lisha, I have a little 22 rifle, a calf and a dog. The dog is bob-tailed and as lazy as a cow. I have two awfully fat little pigs all my own. Dad has some big fat hogs to kill when it turns cold enough. Come to see me then and we'll have shortening bread.

Dad plays the violin and mother and we children sing. We learned some songs at school. We have a Christmas song, a Thanksgiving song, and a Jack Frost song. Our teacher is teaching us a lot of good things.

I can swim by hanging two gourds under my arms. Without gourds my feet won't stay up. We have a nice little swimming pool in our pasture. I mean to finish learning next summer. I have never worked any in the field yet. Dad says I may learn to plow next year, but guess I'll have to plow with my bob-tailed dog, for our mules are regular fire-eaters.

I spent a week with Aunt Tennie Sanders last fall before school started. She lives at Amory, Mississippi, about 45 miles from here, and went home with Uncle Harvey. I surely had a good time; but, Uncle Lisha, I wouldn't like to live in town. Give me the country so I can wear my little blue overalls to school, go barefooted, and see the pretty grain grow.

Well, Uncle, guess I had better quit for this time. My eyes burn and I'll get sleepy at school tomorrow. That dead Mrs. Carrie West will have me on the black horse if I don't know my lessons well.

Now please don't let that pop-eyed Goat get this, for it is my first letter and I'll surely be disappointed if I don't see it in print.

Your loving nephew,

VERNER ANDREWS.

Verner, yours was the nicest letter I have read in a long while, and I'm so glad you kept right on writing until your eyes were sore and Lady Geraldine was fast asleep in her crib. She must be a cute, chubby baby, this Lady Jerry of yours, able to keep plump by taking a bite out of all the family whenever she feels in the least hungry. I think it is just as well she has but two teeth—for otherwise you might all soon be gnawed to the bone and Jerry might have to start in chewing on the mules.

I don't wonder you like to live in the country. Verner, when you can have all the good things and times your letter tells about; fat little babies, fat little pigs, a fat little dog—and all the shortening bread one can eat; and a concert right at home on winter nights, and a swimming pool handy in the pasture lot on summer days. Caledonia seems pretty plumb near Paradise the way you tell it. Vernie, maybe I'll come down to see you this summer and tie a gourd to each of my big toes and go swimming with you in the pasture pool. And if Lady Geraldine wants to take a bite out of my left ear while I'm there, she'll be welcome to it. Anyway that ear is a little longer than the other and would stand a little reducing in size to the extent of a two-tooth mouthful. You can lend me a pair of overalls and we'll both try plowing with those fire-eating mules on some far-off side hill where folks can't hear our language when we get a bit excited in turning around. And p'raps we'll make a visit together over to Aunt Tennie Sanders and find out what sort of a brand of shortening bread she can turn out. For, Verner, a letter like yours makes Brooklyn seem a dull, dark and unhappy place. Every warm day I shall be thinking of you and wanting to be tying gourds to my toes—and to have Lady Geraldine nibble at my left ear with her two sharp teeth.

LEADPOINT, WASHINGTON.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Well, to begin with, I will describe myself. I am eleven years old and I weigh about ninety pounds. I have five brothers and we live on one acre of land. My father makes and skids poles in Stevens county. I live in a little village about ten miles from Canada. It has been very cold through the winter—about twenty-six below zero. This is the first time I have written to you, and I

Magic

Lies in pretty teeth—Remove that film

Why will any man or woman in these days have dingy film on teeth?

There is now a way to end it. Millions of people employ it. You can see the results in glistening teeth everywhere you look.

This is to offer a ten-day test, to show you how to beautify the teeth.

Film is cloudy

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to the teeth, enters crevices and stays. When left it forms the basis of tartar. Teeth look discolored more or less.

But film does more. It causes most tooth troubles. It holds food substances which ferment and form acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

You leave it

Old ways of brushing leave much of that film intact. It dims the teeth and, night and day, threatens serious damage. That's why so many well-brushed teeth discolor and decay. Tooth troubles have been constantly increasing. So dental science has been seeking ways to fight that film. Two effective methods have been found. They mean so much that leading dentists the world over now advise them.

Avoid Harmful Grit

Pepsodent curdles the film and removes it without harmful scouring. Its polishing agent is far softer than enamel. Never use a film combatant which contains harsh grit.

A new-type tooth paste has been perfected, correcting some old mistakes. These two film combatants are embodied in it. The name is Pepsodent, and by its use millions now combat that film.

Two other foes

It also fights two other foes of teeth. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. To digest starch deposits on teeth which may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. To neutralize mouth acids which cause tooth decay.

Thus Pepsodent brings to people new conceptions of clean teeth.

Lives Altered

Whole lives may be altered by this better tooth protection. Dentists now advise that children use Pepsodent from the time the first tooth appears. It will mean a new dental era.

The way to know this is to send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

See and feel the new effects, then read the reasons in the book we send.

If you count such things important, cut out the coupon now.

A Villain in Arms

By Martha Rayner

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

BETWEEN steps in the process of dressing for the party, young Mrs. Hemingway tiptoed in to see whether very young Jimmy Hemingway, Jr., had gone to sleep. The first time she looked at him, his eyes were still wide open and he was performing strange feats with his two fists for his own amusement. When she had succeeded in coiling her dark hair quite to her satisfaction, with just the right soft wave above her forehead, she went in again. This time his eyes were closed, the long lashes curved against his cheek, the tiny hands still. He lay there in his bassinet so adorably sweet and rosy, that a queer tightness gripped her throat as she tiptoed out again.

It seemed almost inhuman to go off and leave the darling, even with Pansy May. She pulled aside a curtain and stood watching for a moment. Pansy May was nowhere in sight. With a little worried frown she went back to her dressing.

Slipping into her frock, she proceeded to fasten it on her way down to the living-room, where young Mr. Hemingway, already dressed, of course, sat absorbed in the evening paper.

"You know those three hooks that I can't reach, Jimmy," she began.

"I'll say I do," grimaced her husband, pulling himself out of his favorite chair. "Turn around!"

"Isn't it gorgeous to be really going to a dancing party again?" she breathed, as his unaccustomed fingers fumbled clumsily with intricate folds of georgette and lace.

He patted her arm gently and bent to press a kiss on her shoulder. "I'll bet it does seem good to you, dearest," he said.

"But I can't imagine what is keeping Pansy May. She promised to be here at eight to help me dress and learn how to fix Jimmy's bottle, and it's half-past now," she told him anxiously.

"Well, did you ever know that irresponsible little chocolate drop to be on time?" he asked. "You're always fussing about how late she is."

"She may be late, but she's not irresponsible, Jimmy, or I wouldn't think of going off and leaving Junior alone with her. She's really wonderful with him."

Fifteen minutes passed and still no Pansy May. At nine o'clock young Mrs. Hemingway came back from her twenty-ninth trip to the window and sat down opposite her outwardly cheerful husband. Tears were very near the surface of her violet eyes.

"I just know something has happened to that girl," she said, despair in her tone. "And here we are all dressed up in our party clothes to stay at home. Even Jimmie's sleeping like the angel that he is."

"Well, he always sleeps till about eleven when he gets a good start, doesn't he? Suppose we just lock up and drive over for a few minutes? Nothing could possibly happen to him." So lightly does fatherhood touch the youthful male!

"Why, James Hemingway!" His wife's tones flayed him with scorn. "I wouldn't go away and leave your son alone in this house, if I never went anywhere again."

"Oh, I say, Clyda, don't eat me alive! I didn't know you felt that way about it. I just thought you ought to have the change and fun. You've been shut up so long. I couldn't see how it would do the cherub any harm." He drew her down onto his knee and stroked her hand soothingly. Her head drooped to his shoulder and gradually the ruffled feathers of the mother bird smoothed themselves into place.

Outside the fragrant dusk of the summer evening deepened into darkness, but Pansy May came not. With an ear for footsteps, they talked in disjointed snatches of this one or that whom they had expected to see during the evening.

"Jane Randall told me over the phone that even Edith Stanley would be there tonight," said young Mrs. Hemingway in one of these snatches. "You know she's not been anywhere since her father ordered Kenneth Ferguson out of the house. But her mother has that rich Seattle lumberman down for the week end and Edith is going with him."

"Trust Edith's mother to round up the rich ones!" answered her husband. "But I'll lose my bet, if Ferguson doesn't come in winner at the home stretch. He's got the stuff in him, if he is handicapped to start."

"I should think Edith was the handicapped one," replied Mrs. Hemingway. "She doesn't know how to do a useful thing."

"Well, she can't help her bringing up, and she's smart enough to learn," answered her husband. "Why do fathers and mothers have to be so blind about their own children?" Clyda wondered pensively. "I'm sure we'll never be so blind about little Jimmie, when his time comes."

"I should hope not!" said Jimmy, Sr.

"Well, I suppose I might as well go and take it off," sighed young Mrs. Hemingway at last wistfully. "If you'll just undo those three hooks again, Jimmy——"

"It's a confounded shame," said her husband. "I'll tell you what: Couldn't we take the little beggar down in his bassinet and put him in the back of the car? He'd sleep there just as well as on his porch at home and we could run out and look at him between dances. It would be perfectly safe there at the club. It isn't as if we didn't know the whole crowd."

"I wonder——" Clyda played with the idea. "I could take his milk along in the vacuum, couldn't I?——and feed him at eleven o'clock. And he loves to ride. The motion of the car always puts him to sleep. I did so want to go."

And so Master Jimmie Hemingway Junior went to his first dance. Warmly covered in his beruffled bassinet he slept on, quite oblivious of the fact that his couch now stood braced against the back seat of the shiny new sedan which had been waiting so patiently in front of the little bungalow all evening.

Jimmie Senior had parked the car beneath one of a long line of maples which flanked the ample grounds of the Country Club. Here the lights from the windows shone dimly and the music of the orchestra and the voices of the dancers drifted as softly as a lullaby. And to this spot, after every dance, rushed an anxious Clyda to see that her child stil slept peacefuly.

It lacked half an hour of the time when the young heir of the Hemingways was due to wake and call for his evening refreshments, that another shiny little sedan with the same family name and characteristics slipped into the vacant space under an adjacent maple. The tall young man in the driver's seat remained motionless for a moment after he had shut off the engine, his eyes scanning the grounds. The opening strains of a waltz floated out to him and swaying couples circled past the lighted windows. Stepping down at last, he glanced along the line of waiting cars, and seeing no one, began to make his way from one clump of shrubbery to another, toward the rear of the grounds. In the shadow of a group of cedars he found the object of his search. A young girl with a dark wrap over her evening gown and a filmy scarf about her hair, fluttered into the arms he held out to her.

"Oh, Kenneth, I thought you'd never come," she breathed, with a long shuddering sigh of relief.

"Edith, my darling—mine at last," he told her, holding her close, and then: "But we'll have to make it snappy. This waltz must be almost over, and someone may be coming out. The car's over there under the maples. Let's go!"

With fingers intertwined, they dashed back across the lawn, and while the dancers were clapping madly for an encore, a shiny little sedan in the shadow of the maples came suddenly to life and moved away. Down the driveway leading to town it crept, then turning to the right when it reached the highway it headed in the opposite direction.

"Where are we going, Kenneth?" the girl asked anxiously.

"There's a minister over here at Hanford," he told her. "I thought we would be less likely to run into trouble if we struck for a small place. I have the license all right, and we'll surely be able to find witnesses."

They rode then in silence, sitting very close to each other, busy with their own thoughts. Dark shapes that were farm buildings loomed up now and then on either hand. An occasional headlight dawned on the road's horizon, grew larger, and flashed by with a whirr of sound that only served to deepen the stillness of the peaceful countryside through which they passed. At last, turning down a sharply curving hill, they came into the short paved street that marked the village of Hanford. Here and there, in widely scattered windows, lights still gleamed.

It was just as the shiny new sedan drew up before one of these scattered houses that an odd little muffled sound came to the driver's ear. It was such a sound as might be made by a girl trying to keep back a sob, or by a waking infant. The young man shut off the engine and turned to take the girl in his arms, half expecting a tearful scene. But she showed no signs of tears. She sat bolt upright as if listening.

The sound came again, louder this time and more distinct.

"What in the world is that, Kenneth?" she asked.

"I'll be darned if I know," muttered Kenneth Ferguson, an outstretched arm fumbling in the darkness behind him. His hand encountered substance, where no substance should have been—a quilt of down that moved beneath his touch. As if encouraged by that touch, the muffled sound became a wail of protest. There was no mistaking it now.

"Why, Kenneth, it's a baby! However did a baby get into the back of your car?"

"I'll be darned if I know," said that young man again.

"Well, someone must have put it there, and I should think you ought to know when they did it."

"I'd certainly like to know," he retorted.

"Poor little thing! It must be scared to death. Let me take it up and see if I can't quiet it." She was already feeling about among the blankets.

"Hadn't we better go in and have the ceremony over first? It's getting late, you know," he suggested.

"Why, Kenneth Ferguson, do you think I'd go in there and leave this dear little thing sobbing its heart out! It might hold its breath and choke to death."

"Well, it would look a little odd, I'd say, to take the infant with us to get married."

"But couldn't we explain to them?" she asked.

"Yes, till we were black in the face!"

Edith gasped, comprehension of the situation dawning upon her. "Whatever in the world can we do then?"

By this time young Jimmie Hemingway Junior—for it was he, as the reader has of course known all the time—was beginning to exercise his full vocal powers. Every instinct he possessed justified such a course. In the first place, he was hungry, and food did not appear to be forthcoming. In the second place, he felt that he was in unfamiliar and not very friendly surroundings.

A window across the street went up with a bang. A head was thrust out.

"Well, it's a cinch we can't stay here," groaned the young man. "We'll have to move to some uninhabited spot till this lets up." The car leaped forward so suddenly that Edith, who had gotten the howling Jimmie into her arms and was exploring his bassinet with trembling fingers, nearly pitched overboard.

"I've found his bottle, but it seems to be empty," she said desperately. "Oh, what's this? I do believe it's a vacuum bottle, Ken—— Yes, it is. They've left a feeding for the poor little thing, anyhow."

"Very thoughtful of them, I'm sure," said Kenneth Ferguson.

"You'll stop just as soon as you can, won't you?" she asked anxiously. "I can't fix his dinner and hold him too."

"To find a secluded spot in the shortest possible time is my present aim in life," he told her.

Drawing up finally, under a tree at the side of the road, he turned the spotlight where it would best illumine the proceedings, and awaited orders.

Master Jimmie Hemingway, who had quieted somewhat as soon as he found himself the object of attention, now redoubled his protests at sight of the unfamiliar faces. Edith patted and dandled and crooned in vain.

"Here, let me hold the little villain!" demanded Kenneth, "while you serve his midnight lunch." He held the small bundle against his shoulder, patting it tenderly, and gradually the wails subsided into broken sobs. "It was not for nothing that I was the oldest of eight," he said proudly.

Edith, pouring the warm liquid from one receptacle to another, smiled at the queer picture they made. Together they proffered the bottle and watched in breathless suspense the first eager gurgling swallows.

"That's what he wanted, the poor little dear. Probably he'll go right off to sleep again, now," said the girl hopefully.

"Yes, he may," the oldest of eight told her, "but he's smart enough to know there's something wrong. I think we'd better put him down in his own bed, while he finishes his meal. That may turn the trick."

"But even if he does go to sleep, it's only a matter of a few hours, I suppose, till he'll wake up again. And then whatever will we do with him?" asked Edith.

"I'm afraid the wedding will have to wait," said Kenneth, with all of a martyr's renunciation in his voice. "Turning up tomorrow morning with this infant is something we just couldn't explain away."

"Yes, I can see that," quavered Edith, almost in tears now. "Aren't people horrid? Why, we'd never hear the last of it! But married or not married, we've got him on our hands as far as I can see."

"Well, someone left him in my car. I suppose we might just pass him along and leave him on the first handy porch," Kenneth suggested.

Edith weighed this plan thoughtfully. "I don't know," she said at last. "If we could only be sure to pick the right people. We're sort of responsible for him—and he's evidently a very nice baby. All his little clothes and things are lovely."

"Well, how about the Orphans' Home? We might leave him there. They always have applications for nice babies, don't they? And they would be careful to pick a good place."

"Yes, I suppose so. But I hate to think of him in an Orphans' Home. We don't even know that he is an orphan."

"That may be, Edith, but we've got to do something with him. I can't very well take him to my boarding-house. My landlady won't admit anybody under twenty-one."

"Oh, I know, Kenneth! We can take him and leave him at our house. You remember that little side porch? Well, that's right under mother's window. She's a light sleeper and she'd be sure to hear him when he cried."

"She wouldn't even need to be a light sleeper to hear him," said Kenneth. "But what then?"

"Oh, we could trust mother to see that he got into the right place. Maybe she'd even decide to keep him herself. It would be a good thing for her. She'd have someone beside me to worry about then."

Kenneth laughed softly. "Hurray! Our problem is solved," he said. "We may even get the wedding in yet tonight, if we hurry."

They turned about then, and drove rapidly back in the direction from which they had come. But this time Edith sat in the rear and kept a watchful eye on their disturbing passenger. It would never do to have him [illegible] and wail [illegible] destination was reached.

They turned at last into the familiar [illegible] streets of their home city. The [illegible] of the morning hours lay over everything. But [illegible] they had gone three blocks that hush was [illegible] by the thunderous approach of a motorcycle. [illegible] drew up alongside the shiny new sedan. The [illegible] raised an arm in a detaining gesture, and [illegible] neth Ferguson slowed down.

"What's wanted?" he asked.

"You are under arrest, sir."

"Why, we weren't going twenty miles an hour."

"Perhaps not, but you're driving a stolen car."

"The dickens, I am!" Kenneth Ferguson climbed out then. One glance at his license plate was enough. "Edith," his voice implored [illegible] can't see how it happened, but somehow [illegible] gotten the wrong car."

"Then that explains the baby and everything," she said, infinite relief in her tones.

"No, ma'am, it don't explain nothing," barked the officer. "You'll have plenty of chance [illegible] that at the police station, to which place you'll now be accompanying me."

They sat in the dingy police court a few minutes later, and faced each other across the [illegible] net, where a considerate Jimmy Junior slept undisturbed.

"And they wouldn't even tell you whose car it was?" she asked, dismayed.

"No, but it must belong to someone of the crowd we know! Which one of them would be likely to have a brand new Dart sedan, anyway?"

"If we could only think which one of them has an almost brand new baby! Do you suppose it could be the Jimmy Hemingways'?"

As if in answer to their question, the door was burst open and a wild-eyed, dishevelled Jimmy Hemingway rushed in upon them. He stopped short and stared at the tableau before him.

"Why—well, I'll be—— What in the world" was all he found voice to say.

The culprits rose and moved toward him. "We were eloping," Kenneth started to explain, "but in the excitement of the moment we must have gotten into your car instead of mine."

"Yes, we must have," echoed Edith.

"Eloping!" said James Hemingway, "Well, I be darned!"

"And we never discovered till we stopped at the minister's house that there was a baby in the car," Edith went on.

"We supposed, naturally, that someone had left it there," added Kenneth. "And when he began to cry——"

"Yes, yes," said Jimmy Hemingway, his face red with suppressed laughter. "What then?"

"Well, we couldn't very well elope with a baby, and it wasn't any laughing matter, Jimmy Hemingway," snapped Edith indignantly.

"Well, I should say not," admitted the young father, instantly sobered. "Clyda was nearly frantic. And that makes me think. Mrs. Myers is waiting up with her till I get back—Myers, the undertaker who lives next door to us, you know. You two come on out with me now, and we'll just have him over and finish up the business right."

A wail from the bassinet interrupted him. The little villain objects. But this time he shall not be allowed to foil the course of true love. Taken in his father as he picked him up. "Come on, [illegible] the case is dismissed."

The Easter Miracle

By Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SOME people, as the saying goes, prefer to be "big potatoes in little fields." Mrs. Minerva Jenkins was one of these. Living in the little town of Silverton, she had at one time or other been a member of every one of the six churches the town boasted. She had commenced with the most pretentious congregation and finally wound up with the flock presided over by the Reverend John Foster, the smallest, and as is often the case, the most earnest and God-fearing band of all.

It was not hard to discover why Mrs. Minerva Jenkins could not remain with any congregation for any length of time. In slang parlance, she was "bossy." She wanted everything her way. Anything in which she did not have a hand was unmercifully criticized if it turned out a success, and if it were a failure, how she reveled in giving sympathetic excuses, more exasperating than out-and-open condemnation.

One's popularity does not stand up long under such tactics, and people soon shunned her, with the result that ever so often she changed her church and her religion.

She finally reached the last church she could join and now was obliged to remain there, since, in Silverton, one's social circle was identified with the church one attended, and to be without membership in some church was to be without social notice.

Now in Reverend Foster's flock she posed as a woman of experience, and reveled in telling how they did this way and that at this or the other church. Truly she was a "big potato in a little field."

It happened one day at a meeting of the Needle Club that one of the members casually remarked since Easter was approaching it would not be a bad idea to plan for something special in the way of Easter service.

Mrs. Jenkins promptly took up the suggestion. "I think it would be lovely, Sister Bettes. We ought to do something that would be a surprise for Bro. Foster who labors so diligently among us." Soulfully she closed her eyes. "He could have a congregation in a bigger town, he with his talents, but as he says, the Lord blesses his efforts just as much with a small band as with a large one. So, for one thing, to make the services grand on Easter, we could have the church decorated beautiful."

"Sister Jenkins," spoke up Mrs. Parker, "the Lord hain't a-goin' to bless us the more on Easter Sunday for a lot o' jim-cracks in the way o' decoration."

"Well," Mrs. Jenkins bridled, "that may be true, but we hain't growin' none, and why? Because we don't do something to attract other people. Seems like Sister Bettes' idea is a real Hallelujah sperrit to praise the Resurrection o' the Son o' Man. Of course, if you don't think nothing o' my idea——"

"I think it would be beautiful," interrupted mild little Mrs. Littler, "and I propose that we do it. But what shall we do, though?"

"Well," said Mrs. Jenkins, "there's thirty-six people belong to this congregation, not counting children and young folks, so it would be splendid if everyone brought a real Easter lily for the decoration of the church that Sunday."

There was a somewhat demurring murmur of approval, for Easter lilies were almost out of the question in Silverton. They would have to be sent for to Standard, the nearest town that could make any pretenses at being a big city, and the price would be exorbitant when transportation charges were included. If each member got a lily at less than five dollars he was lucky, and ten dollars was quite a sum of money to most of the members of that particular congregation.

Of course, everyone knew why Minerva Jenkins made the suggestion. She was carefully nurturing an Easter lily and it was scheduled to bloom at Easter-tide, therefore she would not have to spend any money for her donation.

"Wouldn't plants do just as well, Sister Jenkins?" asked Miss Sophronia Purley timidly. Poor little Miss Purley and her sister, Tabitha, had all they could do to make ends meet, and if each member of the congregation had to donate a lily it meant the Purleys must supply two. The Purley sisters were two elderly girls who had seen better days, and their pride and poverty were open secrets.

"Plants can be had at any time, and Easter lilies is the only flowers for church on Easter Sunday," said Mrs. Jenkins grandly. "I make a motion that Sister Clementina Lamb be appointed chair-lady to gather up the flowers and fix the church for Easter Sunday."

At the sound of her name, Clementina Lamb gasped and turned pale. She was one of those sweet souls that no man apparently had wanted, and perhaps she was better off in not having had her gentle nature embittered by having to put up with some male creature's brutal whims. Not having sacrificed her freedom to eat the bread some man would provide for her, she was self-dependent and supported herself by sewing.

"I—I—don't know that I could——" she began feebly.

"Why not, Clementina?" demanded rather than asked Mrs. Jenkins. "You know everyone better than anybody and you have time—no children to take care of. Surely you would like to do it for your minister."

"Yes, of course," Clementina agreed hesitatingly, for it was true that she knew the congregation better than anyone else. That was the worst part of it! How could she ask the Purley sisters to donate two Easter lilies for the occasion, or poor Mrs. Bascom, or Melita Rand whose husband was killed a short time before, or—but why go through the roll, when she knew that more than half couldn't afford the lily?

But it was a bell-the-cat job and consequently it was wished upon her, so poor Clementina was obliged to consent, and then as the hour for the meeting of the Needle Club's usual adjournment came, the women went to their several homes.

Mrs. Jenkins insisted on accompanying Clementina and drummed ideas for decoration which quite confounded the poor woman. Then, as ill-luck would have it, they met Reverend Foster. Of course, Mrs. Jenkins all but told him what they intended to do, though she declared their plans were a secret, and cautioned him to be prepared with an unusually good sermon for that day.

Clementina timidly asked him what he thought of the idea and without realizing what he was doing, he succeeded in plunging her into greater despair, for, thinking she question the propriety of doing anything elaborate in the way of decoration and thinking to set her fears at rest, he said:

"My dear Miss Clementina! Be assured that whatever you do on that glorious day will meet with my unqualified approval, as I know nothing will be done that I could not sanction. As Mrs. Jenkins says I am not to know the details, we'll speak no more of it, except that I shall do my part with regard to my sermon. I shall be inspired to do my best when I know you are working for something out of the ordinary that day!"

They reached Clementina's gate; Reverend Foster went with Mrs. Jenkins and Clementina was alone.

"It's got to be done," she groaned, "but how I'm ever goin' to get courage to ask all those people to donate a lily, much less get them to do it, is beyond me."

She turned in at her gate and went through the garden, which, although it was early March, was nicely spaded. The day had been mild and sunny, and early as it was, the earth was showing a revivification of life, for the rhubarb bed was sprouting, the winter chrysanthemums, iris and tansy were turning green and the grass plot in the rear of the house showed tender grass springing.

But though the day had been mild, it was, paradoxically, chilly nevertheless, so when she entered the house, after laying aside her wraps, Clementina put some wood on the fire and prepared to make supper.

Once she glanced out of the window. "If Easter only came in the middle of summer when we have all the flowers we want," she exclaimed disconsolately.

After a bit, she went back to the stove, put on the kettle, and then listened intently. But she heard no sound. Did Herbert go out, I wonder, or is he asleep?"

She went upstairs and tapped on one of the bed-room doors.

"All serene," came a voice, "I'm here."

"O, all right. I wondered if you were in. I'll have supper in a little while."

"Thanks. I'm coming down in a minute."

Clementina went down-stairs and presently the owner of the voice appeared at the head of the stairs.

He was her lodger, a man of graceful build and well proportioned. There was that about him that made you, when you looked at him, feel that he would prove a true confidant, and a quality of sympathetic earnestness shone in his eyes that drew one to him. His crisp black hair curled slightly around his temples and his white hands seemed accustomed only to light work.

He was coatless and wore a soft white shirt with a soft collar and a plain little black tie. His trousers were of a plain material and a hasty judge would have marked him a poor schoolmaster or a person of that ilk.

He came down the steps and then sitting in a comfortable rocker, he rocked slowly back and forth while Clementina got the supper ready and when it was done she placed it on the table and they sat down to it.

Seated thus, one might have taken them for an old aunt and young nephew, for the lodger was not more than twenty-seven or twenty-eight

He left the pulpit and went to the pew

"Then the artificial ones will be the only thing left. But if we could get a few natural ones and mix them with the paper ones, it would look a whole lot better."

"That's a good idea," returned Herbert. "Now I suggest that you let me write for the materials for the artificial flowers tonight."

"Will you—will you have the money?" Clementina asked hesitatingly. "I can give it to you."

"Let me buy the stuff, Miss Clementina! I'd love to do this little thing for you, and besides you know I have had a lot of typing these last few weeks and I'm a little money ahead."

"You surely have a kind heart, Herbert," Clementina said, gazing at the young man for whom she entertained an affection akin to that of a mother.

"Not a whit kinder than yours, Miss Clementina," he returned.

The manner in which Herbert Smith became Miss Clementina's lodger was unusual. It was in December that he had tramped into the village of Silverton, that is, if the expression "dragged" might not have been more appropriate. In a weak and exhausted condition he had begged help at various doors but had been turned away until he reached Miss Clementina's little cottage where he sank down, utterly spent, upon the steps.

Like a good Samaritan, she took him in, nursed and fed him until he was able to be up and around. When that time came, he declared that he would stay with her until he paid off his debt. He knew how to typewrite, and with the help of Miss Clementina he rented a machine and often she heard it clicking until far into the night. He seemed to be regularly supplied with orders for typing from a company in the city.

Still, he did not devote himself entirely to that. To show that he wanted to square his debt as soon as possible, he went out and did all sorts of odd jobs, all of which tended to reduce the debt which he had calculated in dollars and cents, except Clementina's lovely way in which she had done everything for him when there seemed to be no hope of reward. That, he said, could never be reduced to a money calculation.

Clementina decided that Herbert's plan was the

"Herbert, dear, it's too much to attempt," Clementina cried when he showed her the picture. "Why, it seems there's millions of lilies in that picture."

And truly there were, especially in the three large bells which were suspended from the ceiling and directly over the pulpit.

"Do you think we could make those bells?" she continued, gazing at the picture.

"Sure. You just make them with hoops. I know how," and the next day he went out, secured the hoops, and work on the bells began.

"I'm going to ask Melvina Parker to sing that Easter hymn, 'The Joy Bells of Heaven.' Do you know how it goes?" and then as Clementina said she did not, he sang:

"The joy-bells of Heaven are ringing,
They tell us a Savior is there;
Sweet anthems the angels are singing
And peace fills the heavenly air.
The joy-bells of Heaven are ringing,
'He's risen in Glory and Peace,'
The joy-bells of Heaven are ringing,
An anthem that never will cease."

"I never heard it and I don't believe that Melvina knows it. Have you got a hymn-book with it in?" Clementina asked. He was so full of ideas but they demanded talent to carry them out.

Thus, with heads full of various plans, they worked, and when it was within a few days of Easter Sunday their work was complete.

Clementina quite thrilled when she saw the results of their labors and while she felt that the artificial flowers could never take the place of natural ones and secretly sighed for them, she could not voice that strain of disappointment.

One thing she was thankful for. Minerva Jenkins's Easter lily was blooming and she promised that it could repose upon Reverend Foster's pulpit that Sunday. At least they would have one natural flower.

The days had been surprisingly mild, and everything was wonderfully advanced. All about, the grass was an almost vivid green, lilac bushes showed yellow buds, tulip beds were well-... iris's sword-like leaves were out, th... valley plots in yards were dotted over ... like projections, early strawberry pla... glow, larkspur and other hardy p... taken up life anew, and already ... warbling.

The storm seemed to be abating ... when they reached home the snow ... altogether.

That night Clementina lay awake ... wondering how the decorations would ... the morrow, and if they looked bad ... Foster would be very much disappointed ... times she was on the verge of ... rousing Herbert to ask whether it ... better, after all, to take down the ... they had put up. But it would ... ingratitude to him after all his efforts ... she concluded to let things take their course ... she fell asleep.

When she awoke, the sun was streaming ... the room. She arose and went to the ... Outside it was still snowy, to be sure, ... ready the sun was melting the ... great patches of earth appeared, and ... was greeney by reason of the white ... in the cherry tree nearby a pair of ... bedraggled but blessing the sun ... the manner in which they caroled, ...

Miss Clementina's thoughts flew to the ... If she could but get a bit of green, ... natural, to place upon the pulpit.

Then a thought struck her. Somewhere ... the confines of Silverton lay Thornton ... which wound through a lovely little dell ... she had often gathered the early arbutus, and ... she could get a few sprays——

It was some distance, but she could ... make it. She ran up and tapped on Herbert's ... door, but no one answered. Pushing ... door, she found that the man was ... doubt he had risen early to look over the ... rations and make such repairs as possible, ... many of the wet flowers had to be put in ... in the condition they were.

Satisfied, Clementina started for Thornton ... Creek and after quite a walk the secluded ... vale was reached, and Clementina involuntarily ... shrieked with delight.

The whole side of the dell, touched by the sun, ... was pink with arbutus. The very breath of ... spring was in the air, that breath made up of ... arbutus perfume and awakening loam. Laying ... down, she happily gathered the pearly blossoms ... in the compost of last-year leaves and pine ... needles.

When she had finished, she had quite a load ... in her hands, yet she had left the spot scarcely ... untouched. With heart singing, she ... through the melting snow-patches, her heart ... tune with the babbling brook at the bottom of ... the ravine.

With her treasure in her hand, Clementina ... started back for home and prepared for church. ... But hurry as she would, she found she would be ... late, and truly when she reached the church she ... heard the congregation singing the opening hymn.

Softly, but as rapidly as she dared, she ... into the vestibule, when suddenly she paused ... her nostrils came the scent of spring flowers. It ... was not the scent of the arbutus in her hands, ... but the perfume of lilies. Then her eyes fastened ... upon the green festoon which they had passed ... over the door and at the lilies with which it was ... looped. It was not a festoon of paper greenery, ... but natural smilax—and the lilies were real!

Bewildered, wondering if she were really awake, ... she made her way into the church.

Had a miracle been performed?

For there were the decorations even as she ... had put them up, the three floral bells just above ... the pulpit, the ropes of greenery festooning the ... chancel rail, the blooming Easter lilies banked ... behind and nodding over it, the looped greenery ... along the pews. But the greenery was all natural, ... florist's smilax and the flowers were real. In ... dition to all of the Easter lilies, there were other ... brilliant spring flowers, tulips, lilies-of-the-valley, ... hyacinths, jonquils and others.

In a maze, she all but staggered to her seat ... and sat down beside a stranger who, despite ... church etiquette, neither turned his head to the ... left nor right. He was garbed in correct fashion, ... wore a double-breasted frock-coat, striped gray ... trousers, a pearl-grey tie, patent-leather shoes and ... grey suede gloves. On the seat beside him was a ... high silk hat.

Who was he? She must know. She leaned ... forward a trifle.

It was Herbert Smith!

f you will order the cab for me, it will save little trouble," she answered, smiling wearily, nything that I can do will be a pleasure," plied, though an expression of anguish swept his handsome face as he bowed and left her.
two hours she was ready, her trunks strapped in the lower hall, waiting for the cab.
ith a nearly breaking heart, Brownie sought and Alma to bid them farewell.
ey were deeply distressed at the thought of ng with her, and protested loudly against it.
s. Coolidge and Isabel ignored her departure ely, and did not show themselves, much to nie's relief.
Wilbur, with clouded brow, and white, com- sed lips, assisted her into the cab, he asked: Where to, Miss Douglas?"
o the 'Washington' for the present. It is a hotel and has a familiar sound, which seems e homelike," she answered, trying to smile, he saw that her lips quivered.

No, Mr. Coolidge, I prefer you should not; it ld be wiser not to at present," Brownie an- ered gently but firmly.
he knew if she gave him permission, it might him to hope, and, besides, it might cause her her trouble if his mother and sister should over that he was visiting her.
e colored, wrung her hand, and shut the door; giving her direction to the driver, she was rled away.
ilbur returned to the house very sore at heart. seemed to him very dark just then; its bright- s had all vanished with Brownie.
e went back to the library. No one was there. e passed on up-stairs to his mother's rooms, found both her and Isabel within.
hey had been watching his leave-taking of the pised governess, and now turned upon him, h faces of scorn.
Now that your inamorita has departed, I hope will show some common sense, Wibur," his ther said sharply.
e took no notice of the remark but handed her recommendation, with the money inclosed, in nee.
What does this mean? Ah! she would take y what was due her, and you did not give her recommendation, after all," she said in tones satisfaction as her quick eye ran over it.
I did not give it to her?" cried her son an- ly. "Of course I gave it to her; but the poor, ulted girl refused to take it; she refused to ain another situation upon your recommenda- n."
The upstart! I'd like to box her ears soundly putting on such airs!" exclaimed Isabel spite- lly.
"Upstart, indeed! I'll warrant that there is tter blood now in her veins than ever flowed in urs. She has been born and bred a lady, which more than I can say of you. There is some stery about her, I admit; but, mark my words, e time will come when both of you will be glad cultivate her acquaintance, and when you will e the day that you, led on by your curiosity and vetousness, ever meddled with her treasures and ove her from your house by your abuse."
Wilbur Coolidge spoke indignantly and at ran- om, but in after months he remembered his ords, and wondered at the truth of his prophecy.
Before he had concluded there came a rap up- the door.
Isabel opened it.
A servant stood without bearing a silver salver, pon which lay a card.
"A gentleman to see Miss Douglas," he said, owing respectfully.
"A gentleman to see Miss Douglas!" repeated frs. Coolidge contemptuously, while Isabel pounced pon the card and read the name, "Adrian Dred- ond."
The color flushed over her fair face in a scarlet ood.
"There is some mistake here," she said sharply o her servant.
Then turning to her mother, she added:
"Mamma, it is Lord Dredmond."
She had persisted in giving him this title ever ince she had learned that he was the grandson f an earl, although Wilbur had repeatedly told er that he did not care to have it used until he came into his property. He was very modest about it.
"Of course, there is a mistake," returned Mrs. Coolidge. "You had better pay more attention. The gentleman doubtless wishes to see Miss Isabel," she said severely to the servant.
"Isabel, you must go down and receive him yourself. Find out, if you can, what he wants of her, and make yourself as agreeable as possible to him," Mrs. Coolidge remarked, running her eye critically over her daughter, to see that everything was all right.
"It is time that minx was out of the way; she seems to have a strange faculty for bewitching the gentlemen, without appearing to do so," muttered Isabel, as she swept from the room, smoothing out her distorted face, and followed by her brother's contemptuous glances.
Wilbur himself soon after arose and left.
A jealous feeling was beginning to creep into his own heart, and he wondered what Adrian Dredmond could want of Brownie Douglas.

CHAPTER XVIII.

AN UNSUCCESSFUL SEARCH.

When Isabel entered the drawing-room, Mr. Dredmond arose to salute her; but an expression of disappointment swept over his fine face when he saw Miss Coolidge instead of Miss Douglas.
Isabel approached him, holding out her white hand, and saying cordially:
"This is a pleasure, truly, my lord."
He flushed at the title.
"You mistake, Miss Coolidge," he said smilingly as he shook hands with her. "I am not my lord, or at least I should say that I prefer not to answer to that title at present. While my grandfather lives I prefer to be only plain Mr. Dredmond."
"The title suits you, nevertheless," she answered, sweeping him an admiring glance, and then drooping her lashes shyly.
"I hope to be worthy of it when it becomes mine," he replied gravely, and wondering why she did not explain Miss Douglas's absence.
But it was no part of her plan to do so.
She intended to appropriate the call to herself, and make the most of her opportunity.
Ever since she had learned that he was heir to an earldom she had resolved to exert all her powers to win him, and become "my lady," and now she set herself to work to charm him.
She began chatting in a lively manner, and possessing much native tact, and a very pleasing address, she beguiled him out of half an hour before he was aware of it.
"I beg your pardon," he said, starting, when he heard the hall clock strike, "but I wished to see Miss Douglas. I have a little piece of property belonging to her, which I desire to return."
Isabel longed to ask what it was but dare not.
"Miss Douglas!" she said with elevated eyebrows and well-assumed surprise.
"Yes; I inquired for her when I gave my card to the servant."
"I am sorry there should have been any mistake, Mr. Dredmond," replied Isabel, smiling sweetly but inwardly raging, "but the servant must have misunderstood, for he brought your card to me; besides, Miss Douglas is not with us now, she has left."
"Left! Indeed, I thought she came abroad with you, and intended to return with you," he said in great surprise and beginning to think that all was not right.
"I know nothing as to her intentions, Mr. Dredmond, but we have been pained to discover that Miss Douglas is not trustworthy, and mamma was therefore obliged to dispense with her services."
The lie stung her tongue, but she remembered his evident admiration of Brownie the night of the opera, and she resolved to disenchant him if possible.
"Not trustworthy!" he exclaimed, aghast.
He would have staked his own honor against hers.
"It is very painful, is it not, Mr. Dredmond, when she appeared so innocent and was so beautiful?" asked Isabel with a sad smile.
He did not reply, and she went on:
"But we found that she had been taking that which did not belong to her, and of course mamma could no longer trust the girls under her influence."
The artful girl's tone and manner expressed the deepest regret, but he was not deceived by it, although her statement of Brownie's dishonesty confounded him.
"Impossible!" he ejaculated, with a pained, startled look, and his mind went back to that moment when her pure face lay for one moment upon his bosom, and when she had lifted her clear eyes, which were like shining pools of purest water, so trustingly to his, and now he was told that she was a thief!
"It does not seem possible, I admit," Isabel hastened to say, fearing she had been unwise, and not liking the way he had received her information. "Mamma and I were infinitely shocked when we discovered it, but the proof was too incontestable, even without her evident guilt, for us to doubt."
"Was she—did she confess her—fault?" he stammered.
"Oh, no! such persons never do that, you know; they always put on any amount of airs, and make a great show of innocence. But, then, we had the proof right in our own hands."
"Would you mind telling me what she has done—what proof you have of her guilt? Perhaps there may be some misunderstanding to which I could suggest an explanation," he said, inwardly writhing with pain at her words.
"Excuse me; but that would not be right, and I fear that I have been very unwise to speak of it at all. The girl is gone, and I have no wish to injure her; I only hope she may repent of her folly, and try to do better in the future. Please forget what I have said, Mr. Dredmond, and do not remember it against her if you should ever meet her again. I assure you it is a very painful topic to me."
After a few moments more spent in general conversation Adrian arose to go.
"Can you give me Miss Douglas's present address?" he asked. "I would really like to return what belongs to her."
She would not have told him for a kingdom, had she known, but she replied, with every appearance of kindness:
"How sorry I am, but really I do not know. Indeed, I was so shocked and disappointed to discover one so young and lovely so old in guilt, that it did not occur to me to ask where she was going."
It nettled him exceedingly to have her talk thus; and could she have read his heart she would have seen at once that there was little chance of her becoming "my lady."
"Should you discover where she is, will you kindly inform me?" he asked.
"Oh, certainly, with great pleasure," smiled the fascinating hypocrite.
"I still think you will find there has been some mistake, Miss Coolidge," he added gravely. "I knew something of Miss Douglas before meeting her in this country, and the statement you have made regarding her seems utterly impossible."
"You!" exclaimed Isabel, her heart bounding wildly. "Did you know Miss Douglas in America?"
Perhaps, after all, here was the solution of the mystery of those beautiful gems, and that card with the names of counts and lords upon it. Had he had anything to do with it?
Her brain reeled at the thought.
She hung breathless on his reply.
"I knew of her, although I never made her acquaintance, until your brother introduced me at the opera the other evening."
She breathed more freely now; he had not given Brownie the gems, that was evident. He knew nothing of the card.
"I have friends who know her intimately," he went on, watching her keenly, to mark the effect of his words. "She was a Philadelphian, and belonged to a very wealthy and honorable family. About a month ago—perhaps a little more—death and misfortune suddenly deprived her of everything. She is very highly educated, as undoubtedly you have discovered, and before the trouble came upon her she moved in the very best circles. I speak of this merely to show you why I believe it impossible for Miss Douglas to be guilty of what you accuse her. I trust, also, to hear ere long that you have been mistaken."
And with this thorn planted in Miss Isabel's conscience, Adrian Dredmond bowed himself from her presence, leaving her astounded, confused and with a heavy weight of guilt upon her heart.
What had she done!
Accused an innocent girl of theft, and stolen a fortune from her; then driven her forth in disgrace into an uncharitable world to beg her bread or starve; for likely as not it would come to that since she had no recommendation wherewith to gain another place.
She sat for an hour in anything but agreeable meditation.
She did not know what to do, or which way to turn in the matter. Had she known Miss Douglas's address, she would have hastened to send the casket to her, and considered herself lucky to be so well rid of it.
"If only Wilbur did not know about it, mamma and I could hide the jewels, and deny all knowledge of them," she murmured in deep perplexity.
She finally resolved that she would say nothing to any one concerning what Adrian Dredmond had told her, but keep the matter to herself for a few days at least; and if the governess did come to demand the jewels again, she would tell her mother, and persuade her to give them up quietly and save further trouble.
"At all events," she added with a sigh of relief as she went to her own room, "she is gone and I've nothing more to fear from her charms."
That any one should accuse Brownie Douglas of the crime of theft was sufficient to drive him wild.
Did he not know that she had been reared with tenderest care? Had she not the blood of royalty in her veins? and had he not seen her in all the brightness and purity of her young life, and been assured of her integrity by his friend Gordon?
How well he remembered that scene in the vestibule of the Art Gallery, where she had appeared like some beautiful vision to him, with her bright, sweet face, and clad so richly, yet simply, in her plain black silk, protected by the linen ulster.

We Want to Place a Congoleum Rug in Every American Home

Congoleum Gold Seal Art Rugs are rapidly becoming the national floor covering—universally used in the kitchen, bathroom and dining room in good homes.

They lay flat from the very first moment without fastening. They never curl or kick up at edges or corners. No need to tack them down. Dirt cannot accumulate underneath.

Less work. Congoleum floors mean less worry and no back breaking drudgery. Dirt, ashes, grit, dust or mud cannot "grind into" Congoleum Rugs, because the surface is hard and does not absorb. A damp rag keeps a Gold Seal Congoleum Art Rug clean and doesn't hurt it.

Waterproof. These rugs are guaranteed waterproof. There is no burlap in Gold Seal Congoleum Art Rugs for water to rot. The surface is hard and smooth and wear resisting.

The Most Famous of All Congoleum Patterns

This stunning pattern is a superb tile design that looks exactly like the finest mosaic tile that you have ever seen, in lovely robins' egg blue and stone gray colorings. Such a rug in your kitchen will change the appearance of the whole room. In the dining room it gives an effect impossibly beautiful to describe. For a bedroom it is the most appropriate pattern imaginable. For the bathroom it is absolutely ideal.

The Trunk-Type Tractor

By Carol C. Crain.

THOUGH probably the oldest style, it should not be regarded as the most practical. In Hindoo eyes, however, nothing could be better.

So valuable were elephants as beasts of burden in Siam in 1861 that the king of that country could not comprehend how we got along without them. He desired to relieve this sad condition, and, accordingly, wrote a letter to President Buchanan; but the slow-traveling missive was received by Abraham Lincoln, who had, in the meantime, moved into the White House.

"If on the continent of America," the Siamese ruler suggested, "several pairs of young male and female elephants could be turned loose in forests where there was an abundance of water and grass, to attempt to raise them would be well. If the climate should prove favorable, they will increase into large herds as on the continent of Asia. The inhabitants of America will be able to catch and tame them. On account of their great strength and size, they could be made to carry very heavy loads and would be of benefit to the country since they can travel where carriage and other roads have not been laid out."

The king then proposed to give a number of young animals if the United States would supply the ship and sufficient food for use during the ocean voyage. He asked the President and Congress to answer his letter soon and to state whether his gift was wanted.

When Secretary Seward queried Lincoln as to what should be done with the elephants if they came, the head of the nation said something about using them to "stamp out the rebellion." The offer of the Siamese king was then declined with thanks.

If that letter had been received by Buchanan, he might have taken a receptive attitude toward the matter. Indeed, nearly sixty years ago we might have had tractors of the flap-eared, trunk-carrying type.

But who would want a machine, animate or inanimate, with an upkeep cost of one hundred dollars a month?

Congress has been asked to create a bureau for the development of air navigation in the Department of Commerce.

Hair Often Ruined By Careless Washing

Soap should be used very carefully, if you want to keep your hair looking its best. Many soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much free alkali. This dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle, and ruins it.

MAE MURRAY
The Movie Favorite

The best thing to use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo (which is pure and greaseless), and is better than anything else you can use.

Two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water is sufficient to cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly. Simply moisten the hair with water and rub the Mulsified in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and it leaves the scalp soft, and the hair fine and silky, bright, lustrous, fluffy and easy to manage.

You can get Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo at any pharmacy, it is very cheap, and a few ounces will supply every member of the family for months. Be sure your druggist gives you Mulsified.

Clear Your Skin

Your skin can be quickly cleared of Pimples, Blackheads, Acne Eruptions on the face or body, Barbers Itch, Eczema, Enlarged Pores, Oily or Shiny Skin.

The Back View

IN buying a hat, have you ever been delighted with the front view, then on picking up a handmirror and gazing at yourself from every angle been disappointed in the way you looked from the back? Never buy a hat without taking an all-round look at yourself, for it may change your opinion decidedly.

And for the same reason, never feel that you have finished dressing until you have taken a look in a handmirror at your "back view."

The nape of the neck is more important than many girls realize. Of course if your hair is naturally curly, it does no harm and is often attractive to have a few stray little curls straggling below your hair. But unless the hair is naturally curly, all hairs should be pinned up neatly. Do not draw them tight and leave an unbeautiful line at the nape of the neck, but tuck them in gently, here and there, where they may seem to go best, and fasten them with invisible pins.

And now I come to a warning. If you have a little hair growing on your neck, leave it alone. Taking it off with depilatories, or shaving it with a razor, makes funny "bald" spots on your neck, of a different colored skin, and the hair comes back stronger and darker than ever. If, however, you have already undertaken to remove hair from your neck, and are facing a constantly increasing growth, then you need to invest in a safety razor and shave it off as fast as it shows itself. Either a safety razor or a depilatory may be used for hair in the armpit, and this it is advisable to remove, with thin gowns making our arms conspicuous. But as for the neck, you will have a better hair line, even in spite of a straggling growth here and there, if you let it entirely alone.

Suppose, however, you have already committed the deed—have shaved or otherwise removed the hair from the back of your neck. Then be sure to call your handmirror into play and see that the line of the hair at the neck is not too regular. Look at other people and you will see that the hairline, when lovely, is a little irregular, and that only a wig has a perfectly even hairline. There is a "false" look about regularity of this kind, so if you have been doing any shaving of the neck, examine the effect, and if the line is too regular, allow hairs to grow out here and there to make a more natural irregularity.

In using a safety razor for this purpose, or under the arms, apply shaving cream in a lather, first, of course. Soap lather can be used, but shaving cream is milder. In either case be sure that the neck, or the skin wherever shaved, is bathed in clear water afterward and every trace of the lather removed, for soap left on the skin irritates it, clogs the pores, and makes the skin red and rough. Skin that is shaved will be all the better for a little rubbing with cold cream at night, or at some time in the day when the cream can be allowed to remain on long enough to be absorbed entirely.

Answers to Correspondents

DICE.—The electric needle is supposed to kill the roots of the hair it reaches. This does not mean that you will never have any hairy growth again, for other little hairs may spring up in time. But as the needle goes directly into the root of the hair and burns it up, no further hair can come from the root which has been thus treated. Electrolysis costs about five dollars an hour; in fifteen minutes quite a number of hairs can be removed. Be sure that you get a thoroughly skilled operator. You can pull out the hair between your eyes with a tweezer. Here is a good exercise to develop the calves of the legs and strengthen the instep.

To Develop the Legs

Standing with heels together, toes slightly apart, hands on hips, back straight, chin raised and chest thrown out, rise on your toes until you are standing on their very tips. Now lower the heels again slowly until they touch the ground. Rise, lower, repeating many times.

For legs which are bowed, stand with feet slightly apart, and bend the feet inward until they are almost on their sides. Resume normal position; bend inward; back to normal, bend inward, repeating many times. This may help, though if I were you I should forget that my legs were bowed, and enter into every sport which came my way. People pay less attention to things like these than the people who worry about them ever realize.

J. E. T.—I am sorry that it is against the rules of this department to answer letters by mail or to recommend any advertised remedy. If you will apply to your drug store for the article you mention, they will be able to fill your order.

TOOTSIE.—To care for your hair after such a serious illness, it would be wise to cut it as closely as possible, unless it has fallen out. Then you should massage your scalp every night, placing your fingers flat against the scalp and moving it back and forth on the skull, going over every inch of the head in this way. Give about ten minutes to this each night. Your hair will soon begin to come in, and it will probably grow in quite rapidly. Remember this, however, that your hair draws its nourishment from the body as a whole, and you must keep your body in a good healthy condition, well nourished and well taken care of with daily body baths, fresh air, exercise, nourishing food and plenty of water to drink. This care of the body will improve the skin, also, and this will tend to lessen the effect of the pits the illness has left. I am afraid I cannot offer you any suggestion that will dispose of them, though proper care of the skin, careful bathing, gentle rubbing with cold cream once a day—letting the cold cream stay on for ten minutes or so until entirely absorbed—will perhaps make them less conspicuous. I should massage my skin gently with cold cream every day of my life, and I should be most careful about taking a body bath daily that the pores may be kept open and help to rid the body of any impurities.

MIKE.—Do not use oil on your scalp. You say it does not make your hair oily, but, my dear, that is its object and that is what it can and will do. Of course your hair may be oily without that, but in any case it only adds more oil. So omit it for the present. Do not rub soap on the scalp or the hair when washing it, but merely use a shampoo liquid made from melting soap in boiling water. Pour this liquid on the scalp in small quantities, and then use the fingers to rub the scalp and make a good lather. Rinse very thoroughly. Leaving any soap in the hair or on the scalp often clogs the little oil cells, irritates them and renders them more active. Air your hair each night before going to bed and sleep with it hanging loose. Do not brush your hair for a little while, but comb it gently at night before retiring. I think probably all you need to do is to omit the oil; never put soap on scalp or hair, and rinse the scalp many, many times after shampooing.

BLUE EYES FROM GEORGIA.—Yes, I think you weigh enough for your height at your age, though if you do gain a few pounds it will be all the better for your health. How often do you shampoo your hair? Try doing it once in three weeks, and brush it gently every night for at least fifty strokes—better still, one hundred. Massaging the scalp is the very best thing for the health of the hair, so better try that, also, each night before you go to bed. Your hair is not at all a bad length, as most people these days are glad to have their hair not too long. It is usually wise to follow the styles in hair dressing of the place in which one lives. If girls of your age wear hair ribbons there, then continue to do so; if they do not, then I should not, either.

ANXIOUS.—See answer to "Dice." Another good exercise to develop the calves of legs is as follows:

Another Leg Exercise

Standing with heels together, toes apart, hands on hips, chin up and chest out, rise slowly to the toe-tips, then very slowly indeed and without bending forward or altering the straight line of the back, let the body sink to a squatting position but without letting the heels touch the floor. The hands should remain on the hips. Rise again slowly to the toe-tips, then sink again. Repeat ten or fifteen times at least once a day, and twice if possible.

K. K.—That same rule about not answering letters by mail gets right in our way again. I am sorry, but the object of a department like this is to help many people with each answer. You see? About developing the legs, see answers to "Dice" and "Anxious." For the rough elbows, the enlarged pores, the rough body skin, my dear, there is just one thing and that is daily bathing of the entire body. Do this in warm water, and use a camel's-hair brush, which you can buy at your druggist's, to scrub the elbows and other rough spots, using water with soap in it. Then be sure to rinse your entire skin with clear warm water. If you will give the body a daily bath and a good rubbing with a soft bath towel, you will soon find that all the roughness will disappear, also that your enlarged pores and blackheads will be immensely helped. If you do not have a bathtub in your home, you can take a perfectly good bath by having at hand a kettle of boiling water, a washbowl, a Turkish washcloth and good Turkish bath towel. Stand on a folded towel, and wash the body thoroughly, a small bit at a time, scrubbing rough spots with your brush, using two bowls of water, one of soapy water for the first washing, one of clear warm water with another washcloth for the rinsing. That is all your skin needs, from your statement as to its condition, so get busy! I am sorry you trimmed your eyelashes. Never do it again. Warm olive oil is probably as good as anything with which you can rub the edges of your eyelids. As to the eyes, I am sorry there is no way to make them larger, but if you keep the facial skin white and clear they will look larger. If your nails are so flexible, you are not providing the body with some of the elements it needs. Eat more vegetables and fruits, for they furnish minerals to the body.

PETITE MAE.—You have my sympathy. It is not so long ago that I passed through a sorrow like yours, and it leaves one lonely and with empty places in one's heart that cannot be filled. About your bust, thirty-four is not too large at all. It is just about right. I shouldn't do anything to reduce the bust. Exercises are the only thing which will reduce satisfactorily where there is no great quantity of fat—any arm exercises of those I have given in COMFORT from time to time. Blackheads are nothing more than pores that have filled up with dust which has not been removed and has hardened and clogged the pore. Perhaps you have not been quite so careful as usual lately about body bathing. It is also true that stomach disturbance upsets the eliminative functions of the body and as the pores belong to the eliminative system they may have been on strike. Gentle massage of the skin nightly with a tiny bit of cold cream on the fingers will stimulate them to action, but first see that the entire body is spotlessly clean, then undertake the massage.

FANNIE.—You weigh very much more than you should and the pimples, oily skin, etc., all indicate that you are eating too much food and not the right kind. Have you resolution enough to cut out all sweet stuffs for six months? And potatoes and white bread, and butter, milk and cream as well? That is what you need. You should eat plenty of fruit and vegetables—except potatoes, and bananas—and lean meat once a day, not more. Your breakfast should consist of fruit, with a soft-boiled egg or possibly two—no bread, no butter, no cream, no coffee or tea. Your luncheon should consist of vegetables and fruit, your dinner of a piece of broiled steak, or some roast beef, or a lamb chop or mutton chop or some chicken, or fish. But none of these foods should be fried or have any fat or butter with them. And you probably need to cut down the amount of food you eat as well as the kinds of food. And of course you should not eat between meals. I should not bob my hair. It is going out of style and I think with your height and weight it would be likely not to be becoming. See answer to "Tootsie" about massaging scalp, and treat your scalp in this way. I think you are eating the wrong kind of food to make your hair healthy, so better slow up on sweets for awhile and try to do as I say and eat plenty of vegetables and fruits.

ETHEL, PENNA.—Bobbed hair is going out of favor, somewhat, but if yours is already bobbed and becoming, I should let it alone for a time since it needs to get a chance to grow. Massage the scalp as I have directed "Tootsie." Washing does remove the oil from the hair, but most people need this done about once in three weeks. The little oil cells throw out more oil at once. Suppose you try shampooing once in three weeks, instead of two, if your hair is not oily? Do not brush your hair hard if it is falling out. Rather, wash it, massage the scalp, but handle it as little as possible otherwise. You may be brushing it too vigorously and too much. Look after your entire body if you want healthy hair. As to your other question, it is wise to rub a tiny bit of cold cream well into the skin before applying powder. After you have massaged it into the skin, wipe off any surplus with a cotton pad, then apply the powder. Always wash the facial skin before going to bed, and leave it perfectly clean.

Inecto Rapid is ethical and scientific, the discovery of Dr. Emile of the University of Paris. It is guaranteed to tint naturally gray, streaked or faded hair in 15 minutes, giving it a soft, lustrous, youthful appearance which cannot be detected from natural. Inecto Rapid created the new art of hair tinting. It is permanent, and not affected by salt water, sunshine, perspiration, Turkish or Russian Baths and permits permanent waving. It is totally different from hair dyes or restoratives. Inecto Rapid does not merely coat the hair surface. It repigmentizes the hair shaft. 97% of Europe's best hairdressers use Inecto Rapid exclusively; thousands of the best shops in this country have adopted it. May be applied in the privacy of your home.

BLUE EYES.—Yes, you are somewhat over-weight and do need to diet. The first thing you should do is to cut out all sweets. I should not be surprised if you were very fond of candy, cake, pie, preserves, and other sweet things. These must be put entirely out of your diet list for awhile. Then cut out potatoes, white bread, rice and macaroni. You are not so much overweight that you need to omit butter from your diet, but you must make up your mind to avoid rich gravies, fat meats, and any other sweet or greasy foods. You have all the vegetables to choose from, can eat eggs, fish, chicken, lean meats of all kinds—though they should never be fried—and you should eat fruit. Can't you get dried prunes and dried apricots? Soak these over night in plenty of water, after washing, then cook them in the water in which they have soaked until they are well done, soft and palatable. You can eat cooked fruit of this description even if you cannot get fresh fruits where you live.

FROM ILLINOIS.—The eye, I should think, could not cause any trouble with your hair or cause it to turn gray, but it is possible that whatever caused the trouble with the eye might also cause trouble with the hair. I should judge, in any case, that you needed plenty of exercise, indoor as well as outdoor, and that you should practice every possible kind of exercise for fifteen minutes night and morning daily. In addition you should massage the scalp nightly, and should see that your body is well nourished. The object of scalp massage is to keep the scalp loose on the skull and to let the blood circulate freely there. Massage will help, no matter what the trouble is, so persist in it. Your circulation needs to be stimulated, and that is why I prescribe exercises. As to the mark of which you speak, it might be removed by electricity, but I should leave it alone. It is safer.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF CHARLES VIVIAN.

...inquest on the body of Paul Marchmont ...egun in the gloomy library of Hamilton ...The news of the tragedy had spread like ...re, making the men angry and ready to fol... ...p the vaguest suspicion, turning the women ...and terrified.

...owners of the houses that had been bur... ...ed were shaken with selfish joy at their own ...s. No one doubted that the murder was the ...of those same burglars, and the hastily em... ...d jury met hot-foot to hunt the robbers ...But as the inquest progressed in the hushed room a change came over jury and spectators alike.

Sir Charles Vivian grew livid where he sat waiting, for, to the astonishment of every one, he was not among the jury of county neighbors, but waiting his turn as a witness.

The butler had been called first, and the questions of the coroner had brought answers that were nervously glib.

Brookes had been dismissed by his master at an earlier hour than usual on the night of the tragedy. He had locked up and gone to bed. Oh, how carefully and covertly had he ascertained during the two days since that night of horror that no sleepless servant was able to give the lie to any of his statements!

In the morning he had been awakened by a screaming and knocking at his door. Jane Holliday, the under housemaid, had been the first to enter Mr. Marchmont's sitting-room, and had found him there, dead on the floor. To the best of Brookes' knowledge there had been no robbery; nothing was missing from the house.

"Was there anything unusual the day before? Had Mr. Marchmont any visitors?" The coroner looked with pity at the trembling servant, who seemed so broken down with grief.

"There was—nothing unusual!" Brookes hesitated. "Sir Charles Vivian came to luncheon. There were no other visitors."

Not another word could be got out of him.

His ashy face was wet as he was told to step back, and only one of his answers had had any effect on the jury.

There had been no robbery!

A host of unimportant witnesses were called, under servants who knew nothing, had heard no noise or disturbance, and gave the dead man the best of characters as a master. And then the housekeeper.

Tall, coarsely handsome in her black dress, the woman stood quietly facing the coroner.

Of her grief and despair at her master's murder there was no doubt; her black eyes looked cried out, and there were lines of agony on her face. But there was something else, too.

Sir Charles Vivian, leaning forward in his chair, saw the hand that hung by her side twitching, her thick nostrils dilated—and knew she meant mischief.

But mischief to whom?

With an inspiration he penciled something on a card and had it passed to Sir Simon Wellford, who sat in the jury. Wellford's eyebrows went up, but he nodded.

"My name," the housekeeper began, "is Mary Gibbs. I have been for some time in Mr. Marchmont's service; I was in his house in London before I came here. He was the kindest of masters——" She stopped, at a wave of the coroner's hand.

"He must have been killed about one in the morning. Where were you?"

"In my bed," resentfully. "I heard no noise. I knew nothing. If I had, I'd have gone down and helped him!"

"Who told you he was dead?"

"Brookes. He came to my door in the morning, and I ran down."

"You were dressed?"

"It was my usual hour for getting up." The woman was barely civil; it was plain even to the spectators that she was blazing with some kind of passion, rage, or sorrow.

"And you found——"

"I found him lying dead on the floor, with blood all over him, stiff and cold. I sent for the police and ran to wake Miss Hamilton"—the twitching hand clutched at her side—"but she was not there! Her room and her maid's were empty. They were gone."

"Gone?"

A little rustle of interest ran around the room. Every one in it knew Gillian Hamilton was not in the house, but in spite of the rumors flying about, they had hoped for some simple explanation, perhaps for her return.

"She had no intention of making an early start for a journey the night before?" At the continuation of his first question the coroner saw the witness's eyes flash.

"Not she! I'd have known. There would have been orders given about breakfast and a carriage. But she had made the start, all the same. Her room was all topsyturvy, her clothes left anyhow. She'd run away, if ever a woman did."

"Why should you use such a term for your mistress's conduct?"

"She was no mistress of mine!" fiercely. "Just a girl Mr. Marchmont had taken in for charity—and what did he get for it? All the time she was crying. The day before he was killed she quarreled with him over a present he'd given her—I heard it. Nothing he could do would please her, she hated him so; him—that dressed her like a duchess!"

"How do you know she hated him? Give a reason."

"I could give twenty. But the biggest was this: She'd a sister in London, and she used to worry night and day to get her adopted, too, till he said he wouldn't do it. And after that she'd just keep quiet and look at him—I've seen her many a time—as if she hated the sight of his face. And"—she turned from coroner to jury and back again—"why did she run away like this in the middle of the night if it wasn't that she was afraid to stay? What took her? I'll tell you, if you want to know, who killed my master." She turned and pointed with a tragic hand to the shut door off the small room of the library, where Marchmont's body lay stiff and stark. "Find Miss Gillian Hamilton! There was no one hated him but her."

An electric thrill ran through the packed room. Gillian Hamilton! The woman who stood there panting with fury was accusing Tom Hamilton's daughter, one of themselves, with far closer ties to the county than Marchmont had ever had.

"We want facts, not suppositions!" said the coroner sternly. "You can stand down, unless," he turned to the jury, "there is any question you would like to ask."

Mrs. Gibbs grew deadly pale.

"Be good enough to answer."

"Ordinary terms," she snapped.

"Ah! Does that include playing cards with him of an evening?"

"Who told you I played cards with him?" The unexpected attack had made her head unsteady.

"It was your habit, then?" smoothly.

"I may have done it—if he told me to. Yes."

"And you found the presence of your late master's ward in the house tiresome! I think we quite see. That is all, your honor," to the coroner.

Mrs. Gibbs went back to her place, choking down an uneasy terror that would not be silenced. Who could have told that to the jury? But it did not matter. They might show in a hundred ways that she had a spite against Gillian Hamilton, but it would not affect that bloody handprint on the cellar stones! Nothing could take from that.

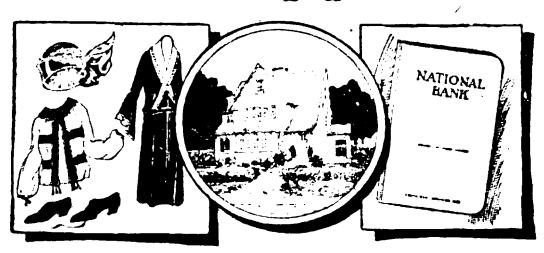
She looked without interest as Sir Charles Vivian was the next witness called. He had only once been at the house and could give no evidence that concerned her.

But the butler was unaccountably, unreasonably fearful. He kept glancing at the new witness and wiping his mouth, for his upper lip was wet.

"You saw nothing yesterday which led you to think the dead man on bad terms with his ward?"

The first question was unexpected, but it had to be faced.

"I saw enough," returned Vivian slowly, "to be able to explain the absence of Miss Hamilton and her maid. Miss Hamilton did not seem happy, and broke down utterly in the course of the afternoon. I remarked on her maid's authoritative manner to her, and she told me that she was no maid, but her only sister, whom Marchmont had forbidden to see her, though he knew she was living in London in great poverty."



Her sister! Mrs. Gibbs gave a startled cry.

That maid, to whom she had spoken openly, Gillian Hamilton's sister! Then the game was a terrible one, exposure nearly certain. She sprang to her feet.

No Matter What You Want Extra Money For, Here Is a Way To Get It

IT'S easy for people to talk. But it's pretty hard to keep happy and content if your pocketbook or purse is always running short.

Pretty hard to keep your spirits up if lack of money is always cheating you out of something you need or want, something you've got your heart set on.

Pretty hard to keep cheerful with that old joy-killer "Can't-Afford-It" always staring you in the face.

Every ambitious woman has some goal, some pet desire, some pent-up hope or wish or longing that depends on money for its realization. And it's pretty hard to keep from getting blue and discouraged when you don't know where the money's coming from.

Maybe your long-denied ambition is to dress better. Maybe to travel—to visit far-off relatives or see the country. Maybe to own a home. Maybe to buy a car. Maybe to get a better education or to send a son or daughter to college. Maybe to pay old bills and get out of debt. Maybe to have a comfortable bank account as a reserve against emergencies or old age. Maybe it's to live better, to get more pleasure and enjoyment out of life.

But let's look the facts straight in the eye. No one ever did or ever will get anything in this life just by wishing for it. There's only one sure and dependable way to have more money in your purse—that's by earning it yourself.

And I can show you a way to do it. Just by using your spare time—time that so many women idle away. You can earn it right in your own home. You don't have to take a single step away from your own door.

All In Spare Time

No matter what your pet wish or ambition may be, no matter what you want more money for, if an extra $3 to $10 or $15 every week or so will help make you happier and better satisfied, then I can show you how to get it.

I have provided profitable and pleasant spare-time home-work for hundreds of people—both women and men. Now I want to start at least a thousand more. The work is interesting. In fact, some of those who have taken it up tell me it is positively fascinating—more like a pastime than work. You can do it entirely at your own convenience—sit down and work at any time of the day or evening that happens handy—start and stop whenever you like. It needn't interfere a particle with your regular duties.

The Master Knitter

The Home Profit Knitter contains many features and improvements never before seen in any home knitting machine. We guarantee that after a little practice you can do perfect work on it, simply by following our plain and clear instructions.

The Home Profit Knitter has a portable stand, and can be picked up and carried from room to room and used anywhere in the house. It is the Master Machine of all knitters.

It's a kind of work that you can take pride in doing. From every angle it's an ideal way to turn your spare hours into dollars—knitting wool socks for the Home Profit Hosiery Company on our famous Home Profit Knitter. It is many times faster than hand-knitting. That's why home-knitting on this skillful little machine pays so well. That's why so many users of it call it their "Purse-Filler."

Fast or slow, just as you turn the handle, this skillful little knitter knits and shapes each sock from cuff to toe. It knits either a ribbed or solid weave, and either a plain or fancy top.

You know the rage for wool hose. Everybody wearing them—men, women, children. There's a steady year-around demand for the quality of socks so easily knitted on the Home Profit Knitter. That's why we want more and more home workers who are willing to do spare-time knitting for us.

You Get Good Pay

You don't need to know a single thing about knitting to take up this work. We show you how. Complete instructions that make everything plain and clear come with the knitter. With practice, anyone who follows directions—anyone who really wants to earn money instead of merely wishing for it, anyone who is willing to make a little effort and do his or her part—can soon be turning out perfect socks—and getting good pay for every pair.

The pay is sure. The Home Profit Hosiery Company guarantees to take every pair of socks you knit for us on a Home Profit Knitter in accordance with our simple instructions, and guarantees to pay you a fixed price for each pair as fast as you finish the socks and send them in. But if preferred, you have the privilege of selling part or all of the socks you knit direct to friends or neighbors or local stores, at your own price.

If They Can Do It So Can You

Some of those who have taken up spare-time home-knitting on the Home Profit Knitter, are making around $3 to $5 a week at it. Some around $10. Some around $15. Some even as high as $20 or more. The amount each earns from week to week is always in proportion to the amount of time and effort given to the work. And every dollar thus earned is extra money—a welcome addition to the regular family or personal income.

Some of our many spare-time home-workers are married women. Some are school teachers—using their free time after school and holidays. Some are young unmarried women who would rather earn money at home than work in a store or office or factory. Some are men. A few give all their time to home-knitting—finding it pays better than anything else they can do.

Some live on farms, some in small towns, some in large cities—where one happens to live makes no difference whatever.

Make Your Wish Come True

If you have been wishing you had more money coming in, here is your chance. All you need is a Home Profit Knitter, a little spare time, and the willingness to do your part. How much you earn will always be in proportion to how much time and effort you give the work. You can do as much or as little knitting each day and each week as you choose. You are always "your own boss." If you like, other members of the family can take turns with you and help you along—for with practice almost anyone can knit socks on the Home Profit Knitter. And whether you knit a dozen or more pairs every day or only a dozen in a week or month, you can be sure of good pay for all the finished work you send us.

Just send me your name and I will send you full information about this spare-time home-work plan that is bringing in extra money for so many others. That won't cost you anything. Yet it can easily make a vast difference in the happiness and satisfaction you get out of life—it can mean hundreds of dollars a year to you. Simply fill out and mail the coupon at the bottom of this page. It's a good idea to do it now—before you forget about it.

Flatulence and Colic of Babies

WE take these subjects for our talk this month as they are the most common of the digestive disorders of infancy, and if one could prevent the colic and attacks of indigestion of babyhood, he would be rendering to humanity the greatest blessing possible to imagine. Flatulence and colic are so commonly associated that we shall take them up together, as both are recognized in most cases by their relations to feedings or meals. Soon after food is taken a baby becomes restless, kicks its legs about or draws them up, begins to grunt, then utters a piercing cry, or sometimes a prolonged cry. The stomach is rigid, face turns pale, then after a time eructions of gas, and sometimes vomits food. As digestion proceeds the pain ceases.

The conditions of flatulent colic are not easy to explain in each individual case but are associated with poorness or deficiency of the milk on the part of the mother, if baby is nursing. It may be the quality or the indigestibility of the milk. Colic is common where cow's milk is given, and in this case it is caused by curds forming, which are relieved by vomiting or being disposed of by digestion.

It may persist when stomach is empty or food undigested.

There is always irregularity of the bowels, constipation being the rule, although in some cases there is diarrhea. If the bowels are constipated the movements are pale and lumpy, evacuated with great difficulty and may be accompanied with a little blood which comes from the lower end of the bowels and is due to the abnormal size and consistence of movement and the straining necessary to evacuate it.

Some babies appear to be very sensitive to the contact of food with the mucous membranes of the stomach and intestines, and even when the food is proper in every respect you get flatulency and colic every time they take any of it.

Some babies are prone to constipation from the time they are born, and of course this interferes with digestion and causes colic.

This condition of things is to be expected during the first weeks of a baby's life as the stomach and intestines are called upon to perform functions, which they are not accustomed to do, and we should not expect the work to be done as well as it will be done later on in life.

There is one thing that a nursing mother must bear in mind, and it is this: she is to remember that she is feeding two people and not herself alone.

A nursing mother should keep her own bowels regular with food if possible, but if not possible by this means, she should take some laxative like Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada in teaspoonful doses often enough to keep the bowels regular; she must avoid acid foods that cause gas, and take care to eat slowly, chewing the food properly.

She must do these things to avoid having any indigestion at all, for a little gas with her may mean colic for her baby after nursing. If after careful diet she still finds she has gas and indigestion, take two teaspoonful doses of Elix Lactated Pepsin, after each meal. I lay sepcial stress on this point, as I am certain that half, at least, of the indigestion and colic of nursing babies could be prevented by mother being more careful about her food and digestion. In some cases the baby will wish to eat too often, and some babies eat too fast. These habits must be corrected.

It is almost unbelievable how soon a mother can spoil her baby by getting into the bad habit of nursing every two or three hours all night long. The mother does not get the sleep and rest she should, becomes irritable, in fact both mother and baby soon get into this state.

The question of treatment comes up for your baby with colic, and the general answer is to find the cause and remove it.

We can help out in your individual case by explaining the possible causes, and then you must find out which of them is the cause in your special case.

There is no question but what some mother's milk is not good for her baby, but there are many cases where if she would look after her own digestion properly it would be good.

Every healthy mother should try and nurse her babies, as mother's milk is an ideal food, a food that no chemist can imitate.

If a baby is suddenly taken with pain and colic, the first thing to do is to relieve the pain, and this may be done by a suppository or a small enema of soap and water or olive oil or glycerine. These relieve by moving the bowels and getting rid of what is causing the pain. Teaspoonful doses of castor oil should be given if for any reason the mother thinks there may be food offending.

There are drugs that are used successfully for the relief of colic—dill, fennel and cinnamon water. These remedies are said to relieve the pain by their pungency attracting the nerve filaments and diverting their attention until the gastric juice digests the food and relieves the trouble. Whether the theory of their action is right or not they do relieve the pain.

If a baby, fed on modified milk has attacks of colic, dilute the milk more with water and also add some simple alkali like lime-water or bicarbonate of soda. You can put tablespoonful of lime-water to three ounces of milk, or one grain of bicarbonate of soda to each ounce of the food.

Oftentimes adding barley water to the food gives great relief. Barley water is made by putting two teaspoonfuls of pearl barley into pint of water, cold, boil slowly down to two-thirds of a pint then strain.

If a baby awakens in the night with colic, warming the feet often relieves and it goes to sleep, or a warm linseed meal poultice on the abdomen gives relief.

If colic persists in spite of these things it may be best for a time to put baby on dried or condensed milk, but these substitutes should only be used for a short time, and the shorter the better.

Just a word in regard to dressing babies, as most of the clothing of a baby is adapted for the most part with the thought in mind of urination, etc., but you must remember that a baby must be kept warm, not only its shoulders and abdomen, but its legs, and put the diapers and other garments on so that they are retained in position.

Subject for next month, Incontinence of Urine.

Questions and Answers

CONSTIPATION.—What can I do for my seven-months-old baby who is badly constipated all the time? I am feeding him condensed milk.

MRS. Z. T., Gosport, Ind.

A.—I should put him on modified milk, giving him teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia in his milk often enough to keep bowels regular. Give him also oatmeal gruel, molasses cookies, orange juice, coddled eggs. Condensed milk may be used in an emergency, but is not ideal as regular food.

INCONTINENCE OF URINE.—Can you tell me what to do for my seven-year-old daughter, as she cannot control her urine? She grits her teeth at night and complains of her head and stomach.

MRS. P. C. D., Tarrytown, Ga.

A.—There are many causes of the condition you mention, and in order to relieve we must find the cause and remove it in your daughter's case. A highly acid urine will get the bladder in an irritable state, so that it will not retain the urine; avoiding acids and taking alkalies, vichy water, lime-water, or a teaspoonful of cream of tartar in glass of water three times a day, will relieve.

Pinworms in rectum will cause an irritation of bladder and affect its control, rectal enemas of warm water to which has been added a teaspoonful of salt will eliminate these if used occasionally.

If caused by a relaxed muscular condition, fifteen drops of Fluid Extract of Ergot, given in water three times a day for ten days, will relieve this.

Get your girl's general health in the best possible condition, keep her bowels regular, be carful of her diet, and if her food distresses her give teasponoful doses of Elix Lactated Pepsin in water after each meal for a time.

FREQUENT URINATION.—I am writing to you for help, as I urinate often, especially at night, sometimes every half hour.

MRS. H. C. P., Enola, Ark.

A.—Pressing of adjacent organs on bladder will cause the frequent urination you mention. Keep the bowels regular, know that the rectum is empty, also that the uterus is not out of position and pressing on bladder. If it is, you can hold it in position by tampons made of cotton, rubber pessary, or have an operation of fixation, which is a shortening of the ligaments, to cause it to stay in its normal position.

SUCKING FINGER.—What can I do to stop my three-months-old baby from sucking her finger, as it is red and sore? Will it deform finger or her mouth?

MRS. A. W. F., Two Harbors, Minn.

A.—No, there is no danger of deforming the finger or mouth, but this habit can be broken up by a little patience and persistence. Try bandaging the hand, or tying it up so baby cannot get it up to the mouth.

Some harmless bitter, vinegar, aloes, put on finger often stops habit at once.

HERNIA.—My boy, six years old, has a raw enlargement that sticks out at the navel. Have tried a great many things for it without relief.

MRS. J. M. L. B., Chocouwinity, N. C.

A.—Get a Nitrate of Silver Stick and touch up the raw surface every third day. Every day cleanse thoroughly, dust on a little powdered sulphur and bandage with a slight pressure. If it does not improve soon consult a surgeon and have examination.

PROTRUDING NAVEL.—What can I do for my sixteen-months-old baby girl, as her navel protrudes an inch? Have used a truss for two months without any improvement.

MRS. J. S., Orleans, Nebr.

A.—For a baby of this age I think you will have better success with a button than with a truss. Take a button the size of a half dollar, with convex or rounded side softly padded and press navel back into position then put adhesive plasters on crosswise to hold button firmly in position.

In order to do this properly you must press down quite hard as there is a slight giving back when you relieve pressure.

Watch plasters closely and change them often enough to get constant pressure.

When changing them, place baby on its back, prevent its crying during this operation, and try and get the renewed plasters on without navel coming out, for, of course, every time the navel comes out you begin at the beginning again.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

clean it up, fix it over and sell it for more money than we gave for it, buy another and do likewise.

Sisters, I have moved here and there since I was married, until I am threadbare. I can't have nice flower garden, yard, trees or anything. I am tired of cleaning up someone's dirt and trash for the sake of someone else. And I can't have anything nice in the house when moving all the time. "Three moves is as bad as a fire," or worse.

Please, shall I call a halt, refuse to move and take the consequences or let him drag me down where he will? I'll have to give him credit for being able to transform a place in a remarkably short time and with a minimum amount of money, simply by cleaning up fence corners, repairing buildings and fences and keeping weeds mowed. But he doesn't do it for the beautifying of the place but for the money part of it. He is talking of moving to Canada next and I just feel like I couldn't bear to live there.

He says we should

"Move about a little,
And see the world a bit,
A plant stays where it is planted
And a stone has got to sit."

His folks were just that way and, girls, don't make the mistake I did. Don't let anyone tell you that people of different ideas get along best together for they don't. They told me it didn't make any difference what his people did, that I wasn't marrying the whole family, but I don't believe it at all. I think when you marry a man you not only marry the whole family but his ancestors for several generations back and their traits come out in your children.

Hoping that someone will advise me, I will close with love to all of you.

BETTY LOU.

Betty Lou.—It isn't that I don't understand how you feel or that I'm not sympathetic but you wrote in such a whimsical, humorous way that I had to laugh in spite of myself and I thought, "Bless her, she'll get along somehow," for you seem to have a sense of humor and it is a wonderful thing. Cherish it above everything else. You probably feel like this:

"I wish I was a little rock
A-settin on a hill;
A-doin' nothing all day long
But just a-settin' still;
I wouldn't eat, I wouldn't drink,
I wouldn't even wash;
I'd set and set a thousand years
And rest myself, by gosh!"

LEESBURG, FLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Please let a sister from the land of flowers chat a bit. I love dear old COMFORT and could not do without it. Mrs. Wilkinson, I wish I could see you. Can't you come down to Florida and visit all the sisters?

I am sending my baby's photograph which I hope to see in COMFORT. Her name is Evelyn and she was six months old when this was taken and weighed 22 pounds.

Please print my letter as my husband thinks the Sisters' Corner is just a make-up.

Love to all.

MRS. G. J. MAURER.

Mrs. Maurer.—Because Baby Evelyn is such a dear, your letter will be printed, not to prove to your husband that the Sisters' Corner isn't real. There are so many doubting husbands that I don't pay much attention to them.—Ed.

ARAGO, MINN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Here I come again, to thank you for your kindness to me. First, Mrs. Wilkinson, for printing my letter, then the dear sisters for answering it. I received eight thousand cards and one thousand letters, and I can never thank you enough for I passed many pleasant hours with my COMFORT mail. Have answered all I could but am not able to write to so many so hope this will be printed to let you know your kindness has been greatly appreciated. I will try and answer some of your questions.

I cannot do fancy work for sale as I am not strong enough. I do a little when I feel like it to help pass the time away. Tourists don't care to buy it either. I was able to be up all summer but have been in bed since the last of September. I am five feet, two inches tall, weigh about one hundred pounds. Have brown hair and blue eyes. I have had to wear glasses since I began school. I am twenty-two years old and a member of the Ev. Lutheran Church.

I would like to help you in some way so will tell you how Mamma makes paste for wall papering. Rub three pints of flour smooth in two quarts of cold water, add eight quarts of boiling water and boil ten minutes, stirring constantly. When cold stir in two tablespoons of powdered alum. Use as thick as it will run off brush easily. If too thick add cold water. We used a white-wash brush to spread the paste. We pasted white oil-cloth on our kitchen walls which are boarded up with six-inch pine flooring. It has been washed several times and is just like new. Everyone thinks it is white enameled and there are no cracks like there would have been had the walls been painted. Don't stretch the oilcloth when hanging as it shrinks when drying and if stretched it will crack. The first day it will be puffed out over each crack in the wall, from the paste soaking it up but when dry it will shrink till perfectly smooth.

Wishing you all the best of luck and health, I remain, Your grateful friend, FRIEDA HEMMERICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Uneducated Mother, I think I am able to help you as I have had about your experience. I was married when only fifteen and between the cares of marriage and babies and sickness after marriage I had little chance to learn, but I have improved opportunity. I always wanted a dictionary for my own one only the last two years and when I read the paper I have it close at hand and when I run across a word I can't pronounce or don't know the meaning of. I look it up in the dictionary. Sometimes I know what it means and can pronounce it. It is a tedious job but it is worthwhile and I find myself recommending it to any one for what we ourselves is more apt to stay with us. I learned the pronunciation marks at school but if you don't know them you could learn them from your spelling book.

Mary Jane, I always feel safe when I quote a precious word of God to a mother in trouble. First Corinthians, 13th chapter, then chapter and read Romans the 7th, entire chapter and 8th chapter. All of these are in the New Testament.

Love and best wishes to all.

MRS. EVAN [illegible]

BEAVERDALE, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Your corner is the best part of the paper to me though every page is good.

The mother who signs herself "Uneducated Mother" is making a mistake according to my way of thinking and as she asked for advice I will talk to her. She may be uneducated in this enlightened country! Education isn't "reading, writing and arithmetic" alone. Education is knowledge and knowledge is far from being arithmetic. Of course it is good and helps a lot but why let your little girl know you can't do her arithmetic work? No, don't deceive her but she doesn't need to know you can't do the decimals. Let her prove things herself. It will do her more good than a dozen helps and it is her teacher's place to help her. Just as it is in another line and is as important to her life.

I know a friend who can't do simple sums in arithmetic or help her children with their spelling or reading but her boy doesn't know she is dull in these things. She has knowledge of the world, has traveled some and read a lot. Her job is training his mind to know of the world, how to select good reading and many other things as important as the three R's. I listened to a public speaker recently that could be beaten in spelling and arithmetic by a fifth grade child, yet his education seemed almost complete and he gave us audience so many wonderful points that we forgot that he went, only a few years, to school.

My own mother raised a large family and I don't think any of us ever took a sum in arithmetic to her. She just naturally taught us that that way was wrong with teacher's help. We never knew she didn't know but we did go to her with harder problems than in arithmetic. She had knowledge and that is education. She could talk with anyone and was always ready to tell what to do and say.

I am afraid you are making a mistake in allowing your little girl to say, "Mamma doesn't know." She will soon get it into her head that Mamma doesn't know anything and as she grows older will look down on you. Get that thought out of your head that you can't make an impression because you can't do this now.

"It's a lie!" she exclaimed.

The coroner stopped her. He and the jury were electrified by this witness, who had been thought to know nothing.

"The girl was disguised, very well made up, but I noticed it," pursued Vivian imperturbably, "and Miss Hamilton told me she had been so lonely and so frightened in this house that she had made her sister come to her in the only way which was possible."

"Why was she frightened?"

"Chiefly because her guardian was so curiously unkind in speech and manner, even while he loaded her with presents. And because, in a way, the household was a mysterious one. It is not, I believe, usual for the upper servants," he glanced at Mrs. Gibbs, who could scarcely be kept quiet, "to play cards, drink and smoke with their master! Miss Hamilton," he addressed the jury with a level earnestness that was impressive enough, "was nothing but a prisoner in this house. She was not allowed to write a letter, to go out alone, or even to use the ordinary sitting-rooms of the house. Why, I do not know! But what I wish to say is that I advised her to leave Marchmont at once, and go with her sister to London. From what I had gathered from her, this house was no place for any girl."

"Did you advise her to run away?" the coroner almost gasped.

"No, certainly not! But how are we to know that she did run away? She may have told her guardian of her intentions without asking leave of his servants. As for her murdering him, I think"—he banished the recollection of that blood-stained may—"that is absurd. Miss Hamilton is a very timid girl, I should imagine, and not strong."

"Is that all you have to say?"

Sir Charles' common-sense evidence had taken a weight off every man in the jury. After all, they knew little of Marchmont, and Gillian was Tom Hamilton's daughter. Her absence looked simple enough now. Truly Gillian had done well to confide in Sir Charles Vivian.

"No, not all," he continued. "That day at luncheon I noticed something peculiar about the butler. Yesterday and today I see that he is scarcely able to walk from some injury to his ankle."

Every eye in the room was turned on Brookes. In obedience to a sign from the coroner he came forward, but though he never raised his eyes his words came glibly enough.

He had fallen down-stairs in his haste to see if the dreadful news were true; half-a-dozen of the servants had seen him.

Sir Charles had missed his point, and he was angry, for he knew the man was lying; it was written on his face.

Mrs. Gibbs sat biting her lips and watching the door; but no one noticed her. The jury were whispering together, the coroner sat impassive. Suddenly the woman half-rose and sat down again. Whose voice was it she had heard in the hall, reckless, imperious? What did it mean? Her brain had been whirling ever since the thunderbolt concerning the identity of the girl she had trusted. Yet she had not, except for the first instant really disbelieved it. That fool of a girl would not say her maid was her sister unless it were true. And at the thought of all Gillian Hamilton's sister knew, even Mrs. Gibbs was frightened. The increasing stir in the hall made her mad with terror, and sensless terror, at that, for the voice she heard was certainly the voice of an ally—unless its owner meant to turn queen's evidence. For the voice was Lesard's.

There was another voice, too, and Mrs. Gibbs's face went red and white in patches, as the door opened and there entered the detective whom she had so cleverly managed to despatch to London full of suspicion of the runaway girls. If he and Lesard were in company, it could mean only one thing, that nothing could save Marchmont's reputation or her own but the timely discovery of the handprint in the cellar. And she cursed her own madness in moving Marchmont's body, for how was she ever to draw the search to the cellar now? And where was Lesard? For the door had closed behind Richardson, the detective.

She looked at Brookes, and knew he had heard the voice of the man who could betray their real position in Marchmont's household. For the butler stood an image of gray fear.

Suddenly the blood leaped to her face. She leaned forward with a wolfish eagerness, for the detective was speaking. All her terror turned to mad triumph as she listened. Good for Lesard! He was here, then, to play on her side—all she longed for was coming to pass; her plan would succeed, and the guilty be brought to justice.

The presence of the detective was no surprise to the coroner, who had known of his arrival in the early train, and of his occupation since. For Sir Charles' words of the day before had borne fruit, and the coroner had no desire ever since to rely on the housekeeper's evidence about the missing girls.

He listened as Richardson said quietly that having no reason to believe they had ever reached London he and his men had made a thorough search of the house; uselessly, he was bound to admit. But a man from the village had told him that there was a secret passage leading into the cellars—could any gentleman on the jury corroborate it? The man had not heard it spoken of for years.

Sir Simon Wellford started.

What a fool he had been all this time! In his boyhood he had found his way into that very passage with Tom Hamilton. How had he come to forget it now?

"You're quite right," he exclaimed. "There is a passage, but as far as I know there is no way into it from the house. But I think I can show you the way from outside," looking at the coroner for permission to leave the room.

Vivian, whose heart was suddenly heavy as lead, quietly followed the two men. He had seen the strange elation on the housekeeper's face, and he was ready for any devilish plot that should fit this crime on Gillian Hamilton.

He never spoke as Sir Simon led the way round the house to that strange, black pool, but when he saw the place where he and Gillian had left the maid, his head swam. They had known of it, then! The girl's agitation had meant something.

With a sick fascination, he watched Sir Simon go on his knees and feel with his hands through the ivy that grew thick against the embankment. It seemed hours before he found what he sought, and he swore impatiently at his own forgetfulness. The detective stood by stolidly enough, though he had reason to fear that ivy might mask a pitiful sight. But Vivian felt only dread. A piece of soiled paper and a charred potato-skin had been enough to tell him that the girl he sought was not hidden, dead or alive, in Hamilton Place.

He followed mechanically as Sir Simon, grasping his box of wax matches, found the opening and crawled through; he stood at Richardson's side as he lighted a candle he had brought from the house; but he could not walk around the ghastly place in which he found himself. He did not know what he feared, but the airless gloom, the black, swirling water, seemed full of waiting horror.

A word from the detective, an unbelieving cry from Sir Simon, scarcely surprised him. He had known all along, ever since he had seen that wolfish gleam in the housekeeper's eyes, that there was trouble waiting for him here.

"Vivian," said his old neighbor sharply. "Vivian."

Sir Charles went sullenly to his side, and without a word looked down at something. The detective was on his knees beside it, but Charles Vivian had no need.

Gillian's handprint, Gillian's slight fingers, were marked in blood on the rocky margin of the horrid stream. He had never seen a hand so small and fine, so delicately shaped; and he knew the print of it now. But that those same fingers might have touched the map he had found, was the business of no one but Charles Vivian! There was a lump in his throat as he turned away. But no one spoke as they went back to the inquest—the thing was too horrible.

Like a man in a dream, who knows he imagines a vain thing, Vivian looked at the housekeeper's hands as they lay clasped in her lap. Large, white, thick, they could never have made that mark. He saw the jury file out to inspect the new clue, and saw, too, that there was a strange look that might have been surprise on the face of the London detective.

The only thing that roused him from his queer, passive suffering was the sound of Mrs. Gibbs's voice as she swore roundly that she had never heard of any secret passage. Vivian looked at her passion-wrought face and knew that she lied, but he could find no explanation for her behavior unless she had somehow managed the whole thing—and that idea the anger and sorrow on her face made absurd. Whatever she might be guilty of, he felt sure it was not of Marchmont's death. And his suspicions of that had been proved groundless.

"I must find Gillian, she must face it," he thought, and knew all the time she dare not face that handprint.

The verdict was no surprise to him, but there was only his own evidence to thank that it was no worse. That, and that alone, had given Gillian the benefit of a doubt.

"Murder by persons unknown," the jury said, as he had hoped they would say. He scarcely cared as he turned from the room that nothing had been said to bring suspicion on the butler, and his half-formed idea of his guilt died. He did not notice, either, a glance the detective gave to a small man in black, whom Brookes had been given to believe was a clerk sent down by Marchmont's man of business, who was to stay and settle up the house, pay the servants, and so on.

Mrs. Gibbs never glanced at him as she swept by with her head high, her spirit elated.

Not a word had been said to implicate either the living or the dead in those mysterious burglaries. Jim Adams would go to his grave as Paul Marchmont, and nothing had been brought up concerning the past of either John Brookes or Mary Gibbs.

The funeral would not be for two days, the lawyer's clerk was to attend to that. But no hand but that of Mary Gibbs should do the last offices for the dead. Tonight she would light candles at his head and feet, and watch by him; by and by she would see that girl caught and his murder avenged.

She swept by Sir Charles, too, insolently, as she knew how. He had come there her enemy, and she had beaten him. She had not sense to know he was going away a thousand times her enemy. Things looked black enough against Gillian Hamilton, but, right or wrong, innocent or not, Charles Vivian would fight her battle to the end. And his first move would be to find her. Mrs. Gibbs could have told him that Tom Hamilton's daughters would not dare to be found.

She went up-stairs to her own sitting-room, heavily, now that the strain was over, the suspicion resting on the right shoulders, or on the way to it. She had come off well, well! There was nothing now to bring shame on the dead man's name. Sir Charles Vivian's slurs had come to nothing, and there was that in the dark cave under the cellar that showed unmistakably who his murderess was. For that handprint Gillian Hamilton should swing. Mary Gibbs would leave no stone unturned that could reveal her hiding-place and leave her helpless.

The triumphant hope in the woman made her fairly reel as she turned to a cupboard with glass doors for the whisky she felt the need of; and as she saw what was reflected in those silk-backed panes she staggered in good earnest.

Yet she had no reason for her surprise; she had expected him, had known he was in the house; it was only Lesard who was standing in the room almost hidden by the window-curtains, and was reflected in the glass door. And yet she was unstrung with sheer terror.

"Why didn't you speak when I came in? How dare you startle me like that?" she cried angrily, as she faced him.

But Lesard never answered her.

Instead, he walked over to the door, locked it, and, as he turned, she saw his face, plain in the noonday light. The woman's knees gave under her.

For this was not Lesard!

Like him as two peas, perhaps but with a difference. A greater strength in the dark, aquiline profile, an inch more across the shoulders, a somber devil in the gray eyes instead of a mocking one.

"Who are you?" she gasped, scarcely able to speak. "And what do you want? Quick—what do you want?"

His face was perfectly impassive as he stood looking down on her, and its coldness made her tremble as no anger could have done.

"I am Lesard," he said quietly, "and I want you—at present. Sit down," pointing, "and answer my questions, or I will go down-stairs and tell the police that Mary Gibbs is the same person as Mary Gresham, who was tried and convicted for baby-farming and manslaughter, and managed to break jail."

Mrs. Gibbs dropped into a chair like a sack of potatoes, as the man who was and yet was not Lesard stood over her with a face like the judgment day.

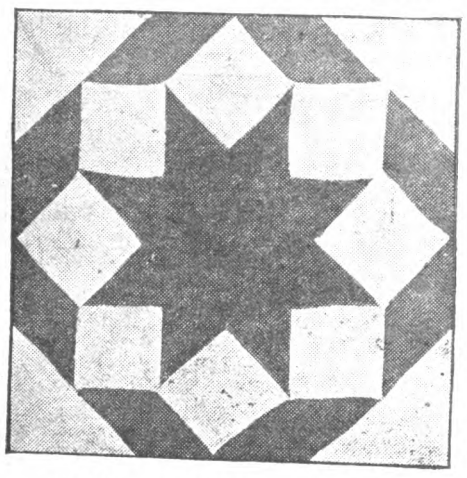
Scrap Bag Bits for Patchwork Quilts

THE different patterns illustrated this month, both old and new require only the smallest pieces, of two or three colors, or perhaps simply a combination of different bits of light and dark material to give the necessary contrast.

Most of the blocks are nine or twelve inches square. Several of the simplest pieced patterns such as No. 4 sometimes known as thet Album, No. 6 as Corn and Beans and No. 13 called both Peek-a-boo and Necktie, are so easily made even the little girl who is just learning her stitches can successfully attempt them.



NO. 3. MRS. IDA L. SOUTHARD, MO.

No. 2 is also a pieced block which by many is known as Rolling Star. In it either two or three colors may be combined or odd scraps of different material, if of the same weight and quality.

The next block No. 3, is an original pattern named The Airship. The different pieces used are all appliqued onto a 16-inch square of unbleached muslin.

No. 5 is an old and effective design, composed of squares and triangles. The blocks are set together with oblong bands of plain goods which frame in each square.

If one has the patience of the old quilt makers an entire quilt cover all of blocks like No. 7 which seems to be known by several different names, will be most attractive. To save time however, blocks of white may be used alternately between the pieced ones.

NO. 2. MRS. DELLA BYFIELD, KAN.

The first design on the next page, No. 8 is one of the numerous star patterns which have always been in favor since great grandmother's time.

Block No. 9 is one of those patterns which forms a continuous and very attractive design over the entire quilt top.

The Wedding March is the name given the next patch, No. 10. One of the advantages of this pattern is the fact that many very tiny bits may be utilized.

No. 11 is another continuous design and No. 12 most deceiving in its effect of being complicated; but, on the contrary, most simple in the making.

For a 16-inch square start with a smaller square of four two-inch pieces, two light and two dark, to this join a four-inch square of a light and dark triangle, repeat these two squares once, then add another block of two-inch squares. Look closely and you will see that these five blocks complete the first or top row of the block as illustrated. The second row consists of a block of two triangles, a four-inch dark square, block of two triangles placed just opposite to first block, a four-inch light square, and a block same as the first in this row.

The third row is the same as the first, the fourth the same as the second, in reverse order, that is first the light four-inch square and then the dark, while the fifth row is also the same as the first. Continue to work in this way or join these pieced squares with alternate white or colored 16-inch squares.

The next block is of four smaller ones, each exactly alike but joined as shown. The two lines in the upper right-hand corner indicate the square of dark material used to join the other four pieces.

No. 14 is an original design, which works out in a very attractive all-over pattern. Either two or three colors can be used.

Terms Used in Croche.

Ch st, chain stitch, simply a series of loops or stitches each drawn with the hook through the preceding one; s c, single crochet, having a loop on hook, insert hook in work as indicated, draw loop through thread over, and draw through both loops; d c, double crochet, thread over hook, insert hook in work, draw loop through, thread over, draw through two loops, thread over, draw through two loops; tr c, treble crochet, thread over hook twice, then work off as in double crochet, there being three groups of two loops to work off instead of two; h tr, half treble, same as tr c, only work off two loops, thread over and then through three loops; d tr, double treble crochet, thread over three times, hook through work, thread over and draw through one loop, giving five on hook, thread over and work off by twos; sl. st, slip stitch, insert hook in work, draw loop through work and loop on hook at the same time; p, picot, a picot is formed on a chain by catching back in the fourth st, or as indicated, and working a sl st, r st, roll stitch, throw the thread over the needle as many times as indicated, insert hook in the work, thread over, pull through coil or roll, thread over, draw through the one loop on hook. Wheel Yoke with Sleeves

Materials. No. 70 mercerized cro ton, No. 13 hook.

In forming any yoke of small motifs or wheels, any size desired can be easily made and the work also goes quickly if the pattern is a simple one.

For the handsome yoke shown two rows seven wheels each are used in both the front and back, while the sleeves are four rows in width the last two rows being one wheel deep to give arm space.

Wheels

Ch 5, join, ch 3.

1st round—16 d c in ring, join, ch 3.

2nd round—16 d c with ch 1 between.

3rd round—Same as last with ch 2 between doubles, ch 5.

4th round—3 trebles in first space, ch 2, 4 trebles in next sp, ch 2, 4 trebles in next sp, ch 1 sp, 3 groups of trebles over next 3 sps, ch 10, 3 groups trebles, ch 10, 3 groups trebles, ch 10, join to first group.

In making the second wheel after completing first group of trebles, ch 1, 1 s c in center of ch 2 in first wheel, between groups of trebles, ch 1, trebles, ch 1, join, ch 1, trebles, ch 1, join to center of ch 10.

The work is stronger made in this way, but all the joining can be by needle and thread after the wheels are complete if one prefers.

Edging for Neck and Sleeves

Beginning at corner of front and shoulder bands on the neck, join thread to center of chs of 10, ch 5, 1 d c under ch 10, ch 3, 1 d c in first treble, ch 3, 1 d c between trebles, ch 3, 1 d c between trebles, ch 3, 1 d c under ch 3, 1 d c at joining of chs 10 between wheels. Repeat making sps all around.

2nd row—2 d tr c in sp, ch 2 repeat.

3rd row—1 s c under ch 2, ch 2 shell of 3 doubles and 5 picots in next sp, ch 2, 1 s c, repeat.

Across the 3 wheels under the arm make 3 rows of spaces. Finish the lower edge of the yoke with 1 row of singles, work along the edge of the wheels.

For a yoke of size 36, with the short sleeves shown one will need a total of 128 wheels, 35 for each sleeve and 14 each for the back and front.

A square yoke the same width as the front can be made if preferred by omitting the last two rows of wheels on each sleeve.

For detail showing how wheels are joined see illustration on the opposite page.

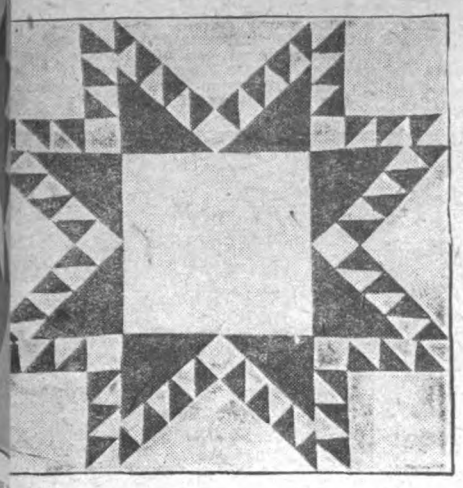
Butterfly Yoke

For size 36 yoke one will require 3 balls of white mercerized crochet cotton, No. 50. Steel hook No. 10.

Begin with ch 65 sts, turn.

1st row—Shell of 2 d c, ch 2, 3 d c in third st, ch 2, skip 2, 7 d c, ch 2, 1 shell, ch 2, 1 d c, 9 spaces (ch 2 skip 2, 1 d c), ch 2, 1 shell, ch 2, skip 2, 7 d c in next 7 sts, ch 2, skip 2, 1 shell, ch 3, turn.



2nd row—Shell in shell, ch 2, 1 d c in first of 7 d c, ch 2, shell in shell, ch 2, 1 d c in last of 7 d c, ch 2, shell in shell, 11 sps over 11 sps, shell in shell, ch 2, 1 d c

17th row—Same as 3rd row.
18th row—Same as 2nd row.

Repeat from 2nd row until 5 butterflies are complete, then continue working across lower beading from shell to shell until this measures 5 inches or the required length. To make back filet band from a top shell of beading ch 50, turn.

Work same as front, make beading for second armhole and join to front band.

Shoulder straps are same as double shell beading. After completing last row of back from shell at top of filet band turn with ch 5, 1 shell between shell of 2nd and 3rd rows, working along the upper edge of the band, ch 2, 1 d c between next 2 shells. Ch 7, 1 d c on next 3rd shell, ch 2, 1 d c on next shell, ch 2, 1 shell between shells, 1 d c in end next shell, ch 3, turn. Repeat directions for beading. After both shoulder straps are complete, finish the armholes and the neck with a scallop of 6 doubles worked under the chains between shells and into every other space on the ends of the filet bands.

cottons wear very well and require no ironing.

Either of the square crocheted yokes illustrated on preceding page will just complete a camisole or chemise while the wheel yoke combined with a couple of yards of material gives one a pretty kimona style nightgown.

The tatted yoke of pink and white given last month added to a garment of batiste or voile is really lovely.

To save time hand-made yokes which are simply straight bands of insertion can be used, substituting ribbons for shoulder straps.

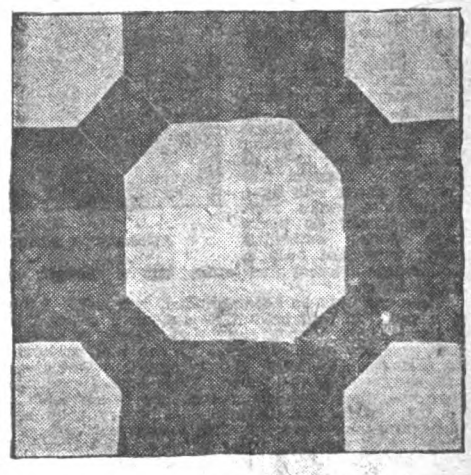
Dainty Inexpensive Underwear

In the spring one's wardrobe usually needs replenishing, and for summer wear especially every woman who loves dainty personal things longs for some of the fascinating ready-to-wear lingerie.

With the aid of the crochet hook or tatting shuttle and a few yards of triple voile, cotton crepe or ripplette, most dainty home-made sets of night gowns, chemise, step-ins and camisoles can be reproduced at home which will cost much less and wear much longer.

These materials all come in very dainty pinks, blues, lavenders and the new peach shade which is being featured as the smartest new color. All of these shades are very becoming and popular, as well as all white which is of course still preferred by many

Besides being soft and inexpensive these



NO. 12. AGNES SCHULER, TEXAS.

If one can neither crochet nor use the tatting shuttle a yard of fine white net which is very durable can be substituted to secure the lacy appearance so necessary.

For yokes use the net double crossing it off or binding all edges with bias bands feather-stitched with a contrasting shade of mercerized embroidery cotton.

Squares or circles of material placed in rows just meeting or overlapping a bit, with a nosegay of flowers done in French knots in pastel shades in the center of front is a great addition.

Another idea for a finish is a double band of three-inch white net sewed on full, to the top of a pink or lavender camisole. Run this puff through with a blue, inch-wide ribbon and one will have an attractive combination which takes little time or trouble to accomplish.

Bottoms of kimona sleeve nightgowns may be made to do duty considerably longer by cutting off the sleeves straight across front and back.

Make five-inch bands of small blue, or pink-and-white checked dimity, the necessary

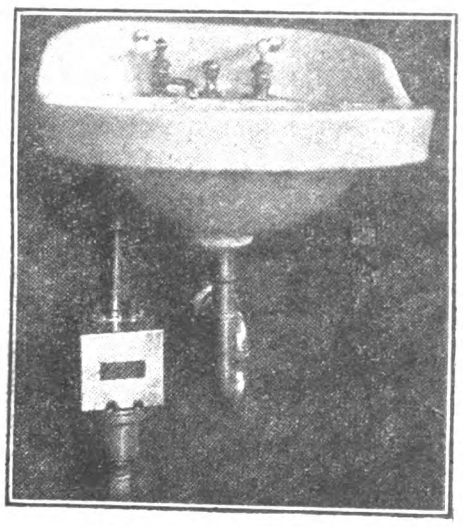
Farm Improvement

Written for COMFORT



Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

AGRICULTURAL advancement may be accurately measured step for step by the rate of improvement of farm machinery. Time was when a farmer asked a prospective hired hand, "Can you plow and chop wood?" or perhaps, "Let me feel your muscle." Now the modern farmer says instead, "Can you drive a truck and repair a tractor?" and adds, "Are you accustomed to handling good farm machinery?" The world does move, indeed, and the fruits of hard labor go to those who keep abreast with the changing times.

At no former time in our history has the value of improved, efficient machinery been so readily apparent as today, nor has there ever been a time when profitable farming so greatly depended upon the full utilization of labor-saving, time-economizing implements that accomplish more work with less man-power at a lower cost and with less backache. Profits in farming are determined by the operating expense quite as much as by the gross income. Those who fail to watch the costs of production will ultimately be eliminated, for they cannot sell in competition with those who produce their crops more economically. The farmer cannot control such factors as climate and rainfall, but he can do much to control the cost of production, and it is this factor that carries the responsibility for the financial showing made each year on the farm. Large crops mean little if their production cost has been excessive. The "dead line" of profitable farming is the point where farm returns are derived at the greatest profit, not where bumper crops are grown to the lasting detriment of the soil with a heavy cash outlay for farm labor. Hard times during the year just past have taught the lesson of economy in all things. To "skimp" in living expenses alone gets us nowhere. Success has come to those who have learned to make each dollar work; to make each dollar expended bring back not only a dollar-plus-interest-plus-taxes, but a margin of profit as well.

How can this be accomplished, you ask? That is a question that cannot be answered offhand in a few words. But it can be answered, nevertheless, and has been answered by the vast majority of farmers who have closely studied conditions and the trend of the times. They have found, for instance, that there is no economy in attempting to farm with old, wornout machinery that not only does poor work but that is everlastingly getting out of running order when every minute of time counts—counts in dollars and cents. They have found that no hired man can work to maximum efficiency with poor equipment, and whistle contentedly as he works, thus earning for his employer a fair profit over and above his wages. They have learned that neglected tools depreciate rapidly, that depreciation adds to the cost of production; therefore they prevent undue depreciation by more careful handling and housing of valuable farm machinery. They have learned that it is true economy to purchase and use tried and proved implements that will do more work better in less time, using good judgment in the selection of the same to fit actual farm needs, and not being carried away by fads or unfounded claims. They have learned that to stand still, in short, means to stagnate, to go back. Therefore the profits have gone to those who have thought ahead, looked ahead and advanced. Those who have given up hope in the face of the hard times during the past few years, and who have lost interest in the operation and upkeep of their farms, are themselves to blame for the disinterested attitude of farm hands; even the farmer's wife and his family lose interest "when dad has the blues." Whole-hearted efforts alone are well rewarded, remember that.

Now let us look at some of the more important things that tend toward farm improvement measured in terms of profit, of increased efficiency, contentment, convenience and comfort. First, let us look at the farm as a whole. Are we giving it a square deal? Second, there are any number of new or improved machines that will be of interest to farmers—though few are in a position to buy every implement that is useful and practical, even if we would like. Third, let us take a peek into farm houses, into kitchens, into the barn, the dairy, into any of the farm buildings, in fact. Let us see what we find, where we could well afford to make changes for the better, avail ourselves of toil-saving devices that lift the load and shorten the working hours of the good wife and the girls as well as for ourselves. Too often the farm of today is modern only in field equipment; from the back door in it is still inconvenient. Fourth, let us consider some of the things that tend to make the farm attractive, to keep it close to the city without being a part of it, such as better roads, automobiles, radio, etc.

AUTOMATIC ELECTRIC WATER HEATER.

A Square Deal for the Farm

Every farmer knows the scarecrow and its purpose; no doubt every reader has made one at some time or other. But not all the scarecrows commonly encountered on farms are of the conventional tattered coat variety made with a pair of crossed sticks, an old battered hat and cast-off clothing. Scarecrows of an entirely different sort serve a similar purpose, only they drive away profits, pride and self-respect instead of crows. Around farmsteads and along highways they may be seen any day in any farming community by anyone who uses his eyes. Such scarecrows should be done away with for two good reasons; first, because they occur only as the result of neglect on the part of the owner; second, because they tell every passerby that Hap Hazard, a shiftless farmer, lives here.

NEGLECTED FENCES along the main highways—the boundary of each farmer's little domain—may indicate thoughtlessness, carelessness, shiftlessness or perhaps a farmer so hard pressed by urgent farm work that he "just can't get around to fixin' those fences." Whatever the reason, such fences are an open invitation to "breachy" stock, to countless noxious weeds and bushes that harbor insect pests and vermin of all descriptions. Fences, perhaps more quickly than any other kind of farm equipment, show the evidences of neglect; likewise they promptly respond to a little care and inexpensive repairs. Fences also teach the lesson to "do it right or do it twice," as any tumble-down fence proves to both the owner and to passersby on the highway who are only too willing and prompt to criticize. Stop their talk by correcting the evil. Put the fences in order, for a broken fence is just about as useful as no fence at all.

HORSE-POWER STUMP PULLER AT WORK.

WOODLOTS can be made to return a good profit—but many simply occupy land for the use of which they bring nothing to the farmer's pocketbook. The secret lies in good management, as we have said before. No woodlot can return a profit without help from the owner. Judicious thinning is essential. Remove the large trees that have stopped growing; they have passed their prime of life and will serve better as firewood while young ones are growing to fill their places. But see that the young trees are planted to fill the gaps, if seedlings have not been left there already. Do not leave choppings and dead limbs that are too small for fuel lying around to decay, breed disease and insect pests, harbor vermin, and endanger growing trees from ground fires. Collect limbs and rubbish into piles and burn in the early spring. Keep an eye on what the trees are doing, making room for the fastest growers, and marking the poorer ones for removal. By careful management, the farm fuel may be supplied each year from these trees, while the woodlot itself steadily improves and thrives.

SOIL FERTILITY and utilization is not entirely a matter of fertilization, though the land that gets a liberal treatment of manure each year will wear well and profitably. Other factors must be considered. Drainage is one that seldom receives its fair share of attention. Perhaps there is land that is subject to spring flooding; perhaps there is a pocket that receives the wash water in rainy seasons or after heavy summer storms; often an impervious subsoil holds water up when it should quickly soak into the ground. None of these things can safely be neglected. Nor need they be. Ditch digging and tile laying machinery simplify drainage problems for the farmer. Muck land may easily be ditched with a new dynamite specially designed for use at low ground temperatures, saving slow and tedious digging and cutting costs. Subsoil plows break up hardpan if it is close to the surface; dynamite does the same work if it is deeper down. Specially designed lime spreaders or spreading attachments reduce the time and cost of spreading lime to correct sourness or soil acidity of low land or of reclaimed marsh land. Heavy, strongly built breaking plows designed to be drawn by tractors now plow brush-grown wild land, thus saving the intermediate cost of brushing and burning. Taken as a whole, with the devices and corrective remedies at hand, there is small reason for allowing land to lie idle or to produce at low efficiency. In this day of high taxes and keen competition, it is the poor producer that suffers, whether it be land or men.

BETTER ROADS BRING BETTER MARKETS CLOSE TO THE FAR

DRINKING CUPS FOR CATTLE INCREASE MILK FLOW AND PROFITS.

MACHINERY left in the fields where last used can also be seen from the highways. We have seen plows left on a tiny island of sod in the middle of a plowed field to rust month after month. Or it may be a hay loader standing out distinct as a lighthouse against a background of white snow. Or it may be a power sprayer deserted in the orchard or fence corner of a potato field until spring. With good care, and housed under cover, depreciation on a hay loader is about six per cent. per year; on the sprayer, worth, perhaps, $325, depreciation is about 10 per cent.—to quote statistics. Then how high is the depreciation on machinery exposed to the wind and weather, to rust and warp in the open field? At any rate, it is at least two or three times the amount of the interest on the investment—and a lot more than the farmer can afford to waste. Perhaps we will say a word more in favor of the machinery shed later on.

SQUEAKY, OIL-THIRSTY WINDMILLS point straight to neglect, and this same neglect may be resulting in wornout bearings on farm machinery, though not all of them have a voice like the windmill to publish it to all who use their ears. The moral of the squeaky windmill is this: "Use and care for that which you have; don't abuse it, for it is the means toward the end of accomplishment."

Machinery New or Improved

During the year just past farm machinery to the total value of approximately half a billion dollars was manufactured to supply the needs of American farmers. Machinery to serve every possible need, from rakes and spades up through the ranks of tiny garden tractors and a large assortment of sizes and styles of farm tractors to great threshers has been required to supply our needs. From seed-time to harvest machinery is ever in demand even in winter other machines like motor trucks, portable sawmills, corn shredders and hay balers are in use. To go into detail concerning all would be impossible in the space at our disposal, nor is that necessary. The trend of the times has been to improve the design and lengthen the life of the machines already patented and on the market rather than to introduce entirely new machines. These we will discuss briefly.

One marked improvement seen in many kinds of farm machinery is the rapid increase in the number equipped with seats. Moreover, the seats themselves have received careful attention on the part of the manufacturers—to the lasting satisfaction of those who ride. Within the last year the metal seats of all kinds of riding implements have undergone changes for the better. Now, instead of being the little, uncomfortable, flat affairs that carried every jar up through a stiff support, we find larger seats with higher backs placed upon long and slanting supports that spring and sway comfortably over the roughest ground. Fewer backaches make longer hours spent "in the saddle" a pleasure, and more and better work is the result.

TRACTORS show the changes and improvements that would be expected with the increased demand. Not only has good work been done along the line of perfecting those already on the market, lengthening their working life, and standardizing parts and replacements, but an effort to support of farm work now places within the reach of the farmer anything from the powerful and rugged big machines down to tiny garden tractor and power hoes. Improved adjustable drawbars make more efficient work possible, and practically all farm implements intended to be tractor drawn are now fitted with better and more easily accessible control levers to enable one man to handle the tractor and the trailer at the same time. Tractors with only two big drive wheels in front are made to couple directly to anything from plows and discs to mowers. Belt pulley wheels that are used for all belt work on the farm are now placed so that the belt does not drag on the ground or rub against projecting parts of the machine and are fitted with handy control levers that can be reached either from the seat or the ground.

A rapid development has also taken place in tractor wheels. Larger lugs that bolt to the wheel-tires now overcome shearing, bending and slipping. Extension lugs of several styles have been placed upon the market to meet a growing need. One style is especially noteworthy, in that the lugs are not separate and straight. This extension lug is constructed in such a way as to connect each pair of lug seats with a continuous curving metal angle securely bolted in place. This curved overhanging portion is really a half circle which is stronger than the straight lug, and which resists bending in passing over stones and boulders. In all tests during the past year this lug has made friends wherever used; durability, strength, steady ground grip and the fact that it is "self-cleaning" in soft going are the reasons.

FIELD IMPLEMENTS such as plows, harrows, packers, cultivators, etc., all show new features worthy of attention. Perhaps the most important is the further development of the use of the two-wheeled truck to support pole weight, keep the implement riding evenly over rough ground without reaching the team or jerking the tractor drawbar, and equalizing the pull. The seat improvement found on such machinery we have already mentioned. Plows show greater specialization for special jobs under varying soil conditions. Discs show little change, but the tandem or double disc is becoming more popular, with the use of tractor power of four-, five- or six-horses hitches growing in favor, and with one man now serving the purpose of two. Packers both single and tandem have been used for several years, but better cultural methods with the need of conservation of moisture in the dry regions and in sandy land have brought packers into greater favor. The principle involved is above reproach, and the time

Glands Used To Restore Hair Growth

Science of Gland Therapy Relieves Baldness —New Treatment Restores Health and Growth.

Baldness in both men and women is now generally ascribed by scientists to defective functioning of endocrine glands. Hair growth is dependent upon the secretions of these glands—these secretions making possible the assimilation of those elements in the blood which are vital to a luxurious growth of hair.

Now it is possible for any bald person to have a full, luxuriant growth of hair through the discovery of E. R. Alexander, nationally known scientist. Dr. Alexander, through the concentration of glands, can supply the deficiency of gland secretion and produce a full growth of hair.

This discovery may be easily used in the privacy of your own home. Within a few weeks you will notice new, vigorous hair beginning to come in and with this growth you can gradually restore your hair to its former bright, healthy color.

So confident is Dr. Alexander that you can be relieved of the embarrassment of baldness and regain the normal hair growth by this method that he offers to send a regular $4.00 treatment for only $2.00 to anyone who will write for it. Use it according to directions, and if at the end of a month you do not find your hair returning with all its former vigor, the treatment does not cost a cent.

SEND NO MONEY—just your name and address to Alexander Laboratories, 623 Gateway Station, Kansas City, Mo., or 623 Terminal, Toronto, Canada, and this treatment will be mailed at once in plain wrapper. Try it according to directions and if at the end of a month you are not more than satisfied with results, your money will be refunded at once. A big Kansas City bank guarantees that Dr. Alexander is reliable and holds $1,000 cash as a guarantee to return your money if you wish.

Don't suffer the embarrassment of baldness—give the treatment a trial on this liberal offer.

Help Wanted

We require the services of an ambitious person to do some special advertising work right in your own locality. The work is pleasant and dignified. Pay is exceptionally large. No previous experience is required, as all that is necessary is a willingness on your part to carry out our instructions. If you are at present employed, we can use your spare time in a way that will not interfere with your present employment—yet pay you well for your time.

If you are making less than $150 a month, the offer I am going to make will appeal to you. Your spare time will pay you well—your full time will bring you in a handsome income.

Its costs nothing to investigate. Write me today and I will send you full particulars by return mail and place before you the facts so that you can decide for yourself.

appears to be rapidly approaching when this worthwhile implement will find a place on every good farm. Harrows have changed somewhat, especially with the increasing number that are seat-equipped. Spring-tooth harrows and field cultivators with two or three detachable sets of teeth to meet different purposes are an innovation. The especially designed quack grass spring teeth give the farmer an implement that successfully lifts the tenacious roots of this pest from the ground, leaving them on the ground surface to dry and to be raked up and burned. Cultivators having a pivot axle and balanced frame that overcomes excessive draft and makes shifting of gangs easier have been placed on the market. In these the axle is not cranked backward to balance the weight of the gangs when raised, but always stands at right angles to the frame.

HARVESTING MACHINERY shows improved application of the tractor as a source of power, with greater efficiency and simpler control designed to reduce the man-power needed in their operation. Power-driven binders that cut a 10-foot swath and harvest from 30 to 35 acres of grain a day are giving satisfaction, marking one of the greatest steps made in the harvesting of grain in two generations. Athough tractor-drawn binders are not new, this machine has a new and desirable feature, making it quite different from others. The power for operating the binder is derived directly from the tractor that pulls it, not from the main wheel or "bull wheel" as usual. This power is delivered from the tractor by means of a revolving shaft with universal joints that make it possible to cover very rough ground at a uniform rate of speed. The steady flow of power from the tractor cuts a wide swath of heavy grain without difficulty, the direct positive drive preventing slipping and choking under unfavorable conditions or on wet land as was so common a criticism with binders deriving their power from the bull wheel. In case the binder does become choked, the tractor is stopped, while the power drive continues to operate and clear out the clogging grain without making it necessary for the operator to leave his seat.

A HAY LOADER SAVES LABOR IN THE HAYFIELD.

A GRAIN SHOCKER that attaches to the rear of a grain binder and receives the tied bundles has in the past year proved its practicability for use on large level fields of long and erect grain. To the big wheat farms of the West and Northwest the shocker answers a great need, for farmers in these regions have long been forced to depend upon seasonal labor to meet their needs, and such labor was proverbially uncertain in both quantity and quality—but invariably insistent upon the highest wages obtainable. The new grain shocker sets the shocks squarely upon the ground, making a neat and compact shock that will withstand strong wind and shed rain. Two tines spread the butts of the back and corner bundles to give the shock a substantial base.

HAY-MAKING MACHINERY is generally being adopted as a means of economizing in time and labor, thus taking a lot of the sweat and worry out of the hay-making chore. A complete line of improved mowers, hay rakes, tedders, hay loaders, side-delivery rakes, sweep rakes and stackers, and a new combined side rake and tedder now meet every hay-time need of farmers. Baling presses, large, medium and small suit any sized farm and pocketbook.

Farm Buildings Outside and Inside

Perhaps the first indication of returning prosperity is found in the increased amount of painting seen on farms. For several years farm barns and outbuildings have been denied the paint needed to make them sightly and attractive and to prevent weathering, but now the closer approach of better times is ushered in by newly painted buildings. "Save the surface and you save all," is a slogan that very aptly and truthfully sums up the great but seldom appreciated value of paint as a wood preservative.

FARM BARNS, hog houses and poultry houses show a tendency to comply better with the needs of livestock and are following practical plans that make for increased efficiency and time-saving economy on the part of the farmer. New barns recently built are modern in every sense; old barns remodeled to meet present day needs have more windows, ventilating systems, litter carriers, and even individual stock drinking cups and milking machines. Everywhere we find milking machines increasing in favor as they attain lasting perfection, for the saving in labor is a great argument in their favor. The same holds true of any improved barn fixture that saves time or lightens barn chores. The litter carrier not only saves tedious labor; it encourages better handling of manure that leads to conservation of fertility by deep and uniform piling instead of scattering as found when the wheelbarrow is used.

TRACTOR PLOWING ROUGH GROUND.

WATER SYSTEMS naturally follow where electricity is available as a source of power. Power lines that supply "juice" at a moderate rate are becoming more and more numerous in rural districts; farm power plants now cost less and are simpler in operation and upkeep. On farms where electricity is used, we find it driving the milking machine, operating the cream separator, compressing air for the pressure water system (a wonderful protection in case of fire), chopping feed, grinding grain, sawing wood and even running the corn shredder or silo filler. Inside of the house electricity has still other uses, but more of that subject later on.

CREAM SEPARATORS show improvement in the simplicity of their main working parts that make thorough cleansing and scalding easier. Ball bearings in some of the best makes reduce the power required to run them at their maximum efficiency—making for longer life of wearing parts, less work for the operator and more cream in the cream can, all three of which points are well worthy of consideration. Milk houses and farm creameries themselves are undergoing change for the better, with cement floors sloping to floor drains that work, with cooler tanks, pasteurizers, bottling machinery in evidence. Screens that closely fit doors and windows and keep out the flies are showing their value in reducing the bacteria count of milk, and excluding not only "these pesky critters" but dust as well.

SILOS cover a wide range of designs, sizes and materials—certainly enough to give ample room for argument as well as choice. We find the well-known wooden stave construction, solid concrete, concrete block, concrete stave, hollow tile, brick, double-wooden stave wall—all these and perhaps others are on the market. Something quite new in the silo line is the continuous inside wooden hoop silo, in which a spiral laminated wood hoop extends from bottom to top like a spring, lined inside and out with groove-and-tongued staves. Double-stave walled silos of this sort and also the more common kind with the contained wooden tires between the two walls are said to be frost proof and highly resistant to heavy winds, and they do not require outside metal hoops that must be tightened or loosened to keep them water tight. Improvements in silo doors and in roofs that open easily but that do not blow open or blow off are other features that show advancement.

SILO FILLING MACHINERY has been improved in several ways, the most important of which is the addition of a small rotary pump that forces the water to the top of the silo throughout the filling process, thus doing away with the unsatisfactory attempts to soak corn-stalks as they passed through the cutter or to sprinkle silage after it has been blown into the silo. By means of this new rotary pump, the amount of water that is needed to moisten dry corn can be accurately regulated. The attachment, moreover, may be purchased separately and installed on silage cutters not already equipped.

CORN SHREDDERS show especial and laudable improvements in the direction of safety devices. In the newer and better models the self-feeder and fed conveyor makes accidents almost impossible. With the operator standing almost six feet from the shredder head, and with no reason to go onto the self-feeder table, there is slight chance of the accidents that were once too common. Levers that control the self-feeder and snapping rolls are so located that they may be reached in an instant; in some shredders the edge of the feeder table itself is so constructed that, in case a careless operator is drawn toward the cutters, the machine stops itself by throwing out the levers. All gears and high-speed pulleys are protected in the best makes of shredders; rigid state laws as well as common sense on the part of the manufacturers have accomplished this end.

The Modern Farm Kitchen

In spite of the general trend toward modern conveniences on farms we still find the farm kitchen considered as an afterthought in far too many instances. Why should the farm kitchen in which mother works long hours in an attempt to please our appetites be left out when labor-saving on the farm is discussed? To our way of thinking, there is no more important place on the farm than the farm kitchen; certainly there is nobody who so richly deserves a congenial and convenient "headquarters" in which to wield her pots and pans, turn out those belt-tightening meals, and prepare her ever-welcome pies and cookies as that same patient, soft-spoken helpmeet and partner in every successful farming enterprise.

What are some of the most pressing kitchen needs? Well, to begin with, there is stove wood to be carried from the woodshed and kindling to be chopped. Does she have to do that? Then there is water to be brought from the pump. Do you do that for her? We know of many a farm where there is running water in the barn, but the water for the house is still "lugged in a pail by a skirt and an apron." Pressure systems are not so expensive as many suppose, and running water in the house will afford more comfort for the whole family than any other single convenience that can be added. With running water in the house, it is but a short step to a bath that is ever welcome after a hot day in the hay field, and an inside sanitary toilet connecting with a septic tank to complete the bathroom will bring all of the convenience and privacy that the city affords right to the farm.

ELECTRICITY on the farm does not stop with electric lights, and power for feed grinders, etc. It just begins there. Inside the house it has many uses that farm folks in the past moved into the city to find—sacrificing contentment in many cases to attain it. There is the electric iron, the vacuum cleaner that picks up dirt from dirty shoes, the washing machine, the sewing machine, the churn or perhaps the separator, if that is not in a creamery of its own. Last, but by no means least, there is an entirely new electric water heater, recently placed upon the market after thorough testing.

THE ELECTRIC WATER HEATER is a simple and comparatively inexpensive device that makes it possible to have hot water in any amount, at any time during the day or night, by merely opening the faucet to which the heater is connected. The heater is of the instantaneous type, in that water is heated only as it is required. The opening of the hot water faucet allows water to pass through the heater, the action of the water itself automatically switching on the current through the heating coils. When the faucet is shut off, the switch is automatically thrown out quickly, eliminating waste and preventing burning out of the switch blades. The operation of the switch is entirely hydraulic, is positive and prompt, and can occur only when water is flowing through the heater. It is possible to connect these heaters so that several faucets obtain hot water from a single heating unit. Thus, the kitchen sink and laundry may be supplied from a single heater; the lavatory and bathtub also may both draw upon another heater. Because of the fact that no current is on when no hot water is being used, this heater is very economical, and where electrical rates are moderate it supplies a satisfactory, quick and convenient means of obtaining hot running water.

Farm Isolation Gone Forever

The extension of the rural free delivery, the quite general improvement of roads throughout the country, the great development of telephone lines that bring this service within the easy reach of farmers, and finally the rapidly growing interest in radio, along with the fast increasing numbers of automobiles and trucks owned by farmers, has broken down the isolation that once existed on farms for at least a part of the year. Today there are few parts of the country where the mail is not brought daily to a mail box within easy walking distance of the farmhouse, and even better service is assured with the improvement of country roads.

There are almost fourteen million telephones in the United States, of which one-fifth are on the farms. This means that about 40 per cent. of our farms, or two out of every five, have a telephone. Iowa leads with five farms out of six, while South Carolina has only one farm in each 18 with a telephone. The nature of land tenure, causing frequent moving of tenants, partly explains the low number of telephones in some places; in the mountain states of the West the rugged nature of the country and great distances to overcome are a handicap.

Radio has taken the farmer by storm, much as has the city dweller, but for a more practical reason. The city man has become interested in radio mainly as a hobby; the farmer, on the other hand, has seen the value of long-distance wireless telephone connection with all the world—if his set is strong enough. He gets market reports each day within a few minutes of the time of the closing of the markets; he gets weather reports and storm and frost warnings, not to mention the correct time to set his watch by. Then he can listen in on lectures on any subject in which he or his family are interested. Perhaps on Sunday, if the weather is bad, he can listen to a sermon by some eminent preacher—without leaving his comfortable armchair or paying anything for the collection. It is not at all unusual for a farmer with an inexpensive set to listen in on one hundred or more sending stations, covering lectures, sermons, concerts, musical programs and political speeches. On one farm where the writer sat with the happy farm family listening to a symphony orchestra play as clearly as if it were in the next room, the farmer remarked: "In the early evening we are entertained by concerts from the East Coast, then come the big stations of the Middle West. Finally, we hear from the Pacific Coast cities late in the evening. The only objection I have to radio is that it keeps us up so late. We hate like the dickens to go to bed—and to get up early in the morning in time for milking." Without a doubt, radio has come to the farms to stay, is making friends everywhere, and is fast proving the truth of the war-cry of radio fans: "We are a part of all we hear."

Automobiles and trucks, for business and for pleasure, together with the better-paved "all season" roads that are stretching out through the country at the rate of thousands of miles each year, are creating a close link between the farmer and his market, his church, his county seat, or the city to which he takes the "missus" and the children for amusement. Notwithstanding the economic depression of the past years, more than a million automobiles and 113,000 motor trucks have gone onto farms! With his own automobile the farmer has at his disposal the greatest means of diminishing distance that has ever been invented, only the aeroplane excepted. The automobile makes it possible for the rural dweller to travel where he wishes, stay as long as he likes, and still get home in time for chores. He can go to the city for amusement, but can get home in time for a bed that is better by far than those to be found in hotels; he can eat his own wholesome food in the country, then go to the city to the movie. In short, he can take the best the city has to offer, but can avoid all that is unattractive, the poverty, the bad air and the disease. The automobile has made the city wage earner envy the farmer.

KEEP BEES

It Pays In Several Ways

By A. Printzlau Bowen

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

TALK about being busy as a bee! Few people realize just how busy they are—how much effort is required in the making of a pound of honey, how many trips are made, and how far.

To be hatched a "worker" in the bee family means a strenuous life—in fact so strenuous that it endures but about six weeks.

Some of us humans have never fully realized the amount of activity contained in a bee-hive; the mother—laying about 3,000 eggs daily during the summer season.

A pound of honey requires the nectar from 62,000 blossoms and the workers make 2,700,000 visits in securing it, aggregating over 5,000,000 miles.

A comb of 4,000 cells is made in 24 hours. How do we know this to be a fact? Science has proved it. A recent invention is a device operating on the principle of the turnstile, which registers the arrival and departure of every bee that enters the beehive on honey-securing trips. The concern is an electric contrivance and daily registers the going out of about 300,000 bees.

A bee travels around two and three miles on a nectar-gathering expedition, so if one contemplates keeping bees for profit as well as pleasure, one must take local conditions into consideration if an abundant flow is obtained.

Naturally, the bee-keeper living in or near an industrial town will not be as successful financially as one living near the country where fruit bloom as well as buckwheat and clover are abundant.

Science tells us that attempts to raise fruit on a large scale with no bees in the locality have proved failures; that abundant crops follow the introduction of bees.

Modern efficiency applied to bee-keeping brings gratifying results; not only are the hives of modern make vastly superior to the old-time "skip" made of straw, but the up-to-date owner provides a wax foundation for the busy little laborer to start building the six-sided cells of the honey-comb, and the time thus saved is refunded by extra honey gathering.

The old-time conundrum: "Why is a honey-comb cell six-sided?" seems to have been solved at last. It has been proven that the cells are first built round, that as the combs fill the pressure of the cells against each other causes them to become six-sided. Round cells waste space, whereas six-sided cells not only conserve space but make the structure stronger. It requires about 21 pounds of honey to make one pound of wax, but this amount will make around 35,000 honey-comb cells.

Our farmer friend, who occasionally finds a "bee tree" in his woodland, tells us that in forming the irregular shaped comb of honey hanging inside the hollow tree, these busy little workmen first build braces to protect their little bee city from the swaying of the trees in the wind. These braces are never used in artificial—or, rather, commercial cakes. Wild honey cakes weigh up to 20 pounds—often over that if the hollow of the tree allows it. Many of these "bee trees" have yielded various sized cakes aggregating several hundred pounds of predigested sweetness.

The marvelous generative propensity of the bee is not generally known outside the bee-keeping profession—the question, "Why do bees swarm?" often being asked. Swarming is merely a sign of family disturbance—part of them leaving.

The queen bee (or mother) reigns supreme in the hive until a new queen is hatched—then trouble begins. She realizes her day is over and so decides to establish a new home. Warning of this is given by both old and new queen—the new queen asserting her rights in a piping tone which thrills the other bees into agitation. When several queen bees mature at the same time a battle royal ensues, and the one who succeeds in stinging the other to death reigns. Swarming must needs result in time, else the hive would be too full of bees, as they are constantly hatching during the summer time.

Bee's eggs are long shaped, about one-twelfth of an inch in length, are bluish-white in color and usually hatch in three days. The workers not only gather all the honey but they clean the hive, form the wax, build the comb and care for their young nieces and nephews—but workers do not lay eggs, that alone is the queen's business. After the honey season is over the workers destroy the drones which have simply laid around and enjoyed themselves all summer.

The bee is scrupulously clean, using its comb-and-brush legs constantly. The hive is always clean and ventilated, the ventilation being accomplished by bees standing outside fanning air up through the bottom of the hive, others on the inside also fanning the air into good circulation.

We have often said people or things made a "bee line." No wonder bees can do that better than we for they not only have more eye-space (in proportion to its size) than the owl, but has five eyes—two huge compound eyes and three small ones on the top of its head.

Even though the bee made no honey it would still be invaluable as pollen-carrier, for they fairly revel in pollen, thus naturally leaving some of it in the various blossoms they visit. But the busy bee has another object than pollenating trees and flowers which she visits—she gathers the pollen in her little market baskets to take home for her relatives. Here again is news—how many ever noticed those tiny baskets on her hind legs? Both body and legs are covered with hairs which gather the pollen, then Miss Bee scrapes the pollen from one leg with the other until it falls, a tiny ball, into the basket fastened on the fourth joint of those hind legs, and when she returns home with honey for the comb she also has two full baskets of pollen for family use.

The bee not only lives a short, useful life but has to be on the alert to protect that life, for it has many enemies. The bee-moth is an enemy which will gain entrance to the hive if possible and there produce larvæ destructive to both comb and honey. Robber bees are always on the lookout for an easy living and sentinels must be on the lookout for these intruders. Some birds eat bees, and everyone knows that bears will eat both honey, bee, comb and all.

Honey bees are not alone under the category of bees. There is the familiar fat bumble-bee—many kinds of him—the carpenter-bee who delights in boring holes and tunnels in dead tree trunks and fence posts; digger-bee, potter-bee, cuckoo-bee—in fact, there are about 5,000 species of the bee family—all feeding on sweet juices upon reaching maturity. It's really a compliment to be termed "busy as a bee."

wouldn't have written this time if I hadn't been reading your letters and answers. My mother has been taking COMFORT for about eight years, but I have written to you yet. Well, I have no more to say, so I will close.

Your friend,

FRANKLIN BENNETT.

I should think you would be a little crowded, Frank, you and your four brothers all on one acre of land. No wonder your father has to go off to skid poles in Stevens county where there is more room. When I first read your letter, Frank, I thought you had written "Skins Poles," and I was scared for a minute and believed the hang-over of the war had got moved across the pond.

You must expect it to be cold, Franklin, when you insist on living only ten miles from Canada. Why there's a man in Medicine Hat who has not been entirely thawed out since the hot summer of 1905. British Columbia is a mighty cold place—even worse than Boston. And the only thing that keeps Boston at all habitable is the warmth generated by the Irish population and an occasional police strike. There have been winters in Boston when even such an indigenous product as Senator Lodge has had to wear red flannels. Somebody told me once that all babies born in Boston come into the world wearing three buckle articles—but this I don't believe, or at least it is an exaggeration.

But I do know that Canada can get hot enough in the summer to make up for any below-zero temperatures of the cold months. In July the huckleberries stew right on the bushes and the bears have to use safety razors and eat eskimo pie. Frank, Canada, or near-Canada, has too many extremes in weather. Why don't you get your dad to skid the whole lot of you down to Missouri, that Paradise of the Ozarks? Even the mules are smiling and contented there and COMFORT Cousins are thicker than February snowflakes in Saskatchewan.

TIMPAS, COLORADO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I am so lonesome I made up my mind to run off and see Uncle and all the Cousins. Now let me in before Billy awakes, for I see it is early and he has not opened his eyes yet.

Do you know what I look like? Well, like a girl of sixteen. I am five feet, three inches, short when in high heels, and I tip the scales at 125 pounds. I have big brown eyes and brown hair.

Uncle, don't you think it would be a great plan for all the cousins who write to this department to tell what was the biggest fright they have had in the past year? I know that every one must have had a big fright once upon a time, and why not tell us about it? I know it would interest all. There, I see every one is nodding.

My biggest fright was when my sister and I were lost in a big snow-storm. Now, listen: We have 720 acres of land, which is called Colorado dry land, and it is fenced with barbed wire fencing. Once in winter snow was falling hard. All the cattle were at home, except the horses which were probably somewhere in one corner of the field. Dad was not at home and the storm seemed to last for many days. So sister and I put on Dad's big rubber boots and went after the horses. We thought it would be great fun, so we walked on and talked. I chanced to turn around to see if the horses were near, but, alas, there was nothing but snow all about us—not even the fence to be seen. We turned to go back, but could not see our tracks any more. We went in one direction as we thought, and believed we would have to come to the fence somewhere. The boots became heavy and we soon sat down to rest. Then on we went again. After a long walk we stumbled and fell. It was into a long ditch which runs at the farthest end of our field. Now we could see the fence, so we went around it. Just think of walking around 720 acres! After a long tiresome travel, we came to the fence we knew was near our house, and saw something coming in our direction. We soon recognized it to be mother. She asked us if we knew the way home. Of course we did, so we went home together. Mother had been lost also and was glad we knew the way to get home. Mother had left a two-year-old brother of ours in the house, alone, and you can not imagine the mischief he had done. I looked at the clock and saw that we had been out four hours—in such a storm! And then I looked out of the window and saw the horses coming home all alone by themselves after all.

Our supper tasted good after such a long trip, and we slept until noon the next day. We still felt the effects of the trip. I assure you I shall never go out in such a storm again.

I am one among the bobbed-haired ones, because after a seven months' illness my hair was falling out by handfuls. So I had to part with my long, silky thick hair. I think that it will never grow in again as long and thick as before.

Now won't you all write to me? Of course you will—and send photos if you have any to spare. Surely! I will answer all that I can and will send my photo to the one who writes the longest and most interesting letter. I must go before Billy is awake, but don't any of you tell him that I have been here.

Your new cousin,

BERTHA J. CIZEK.

Bertha, I think that's a good idea of yours—to find out what has scared each of us the most. We know that powder puffs scare Cousin Gus Trick and that French girls with violet eyes do not scare Cousin Jack Wilcox. Now let's hear from other of the Family who have had big and little "skeers." I talked to Billy about this and suggested that he mention what had been the star fright of his long and learned life. He looked at me coldly and replied: "Uncle Lisha, as a reasonable being, I always use my brain to the end that no concatenation of events, however surprising or inadvertent, need cause me concern nor disturb my equanimity." Bill meant something by this sentence. He must have, for he looked so serious. But I'll never know, for I did not think best to ask him for an explanation. Bill is sort of scarifying himself at times and rather overpowering with his periods.

You must have had a good fright, Bertha, wandering out there in the snow. The next time you want to travel around your 720 acres and tumble into ditches, you should arrange to do it when the sun is shining and there is somebody at home to stay with the baby. And the horses came home to roost after all! It certainly beats all how much animals know. Probably we lost lots of our instinctive wisdom when we left off being monkeys and swinging by our tails. All of it that is left is our love for peanuts and for making faces at each other.

MOUNTAIN AIR, NEW MEXICO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Hello, everybody! Billy, you stay back and leave this letter alone until Uncle gets through with it, for I sure want it printed.

Well, Uncle, I haven't seen many letters from New Mexico, so I will tell you about a country full of curiosities. I came here in '17 and my father homesteaded 320 acres of land. We are surrounded by mountains, and we live on a mesa seventeen miles from town. There are lots of big forests and all kinds of wild game here.

Uncle Lisha, you sure ought to come out here and let me show you around a little. I know you would enjoy it, for there are the old ruins made many hundreds of years ago. They are made of rock and mud and some of the old walls are a hundred feet high. There is also an old apple orchard close by that is two or three hundred years old and still bears fruit. In the Abo Canyon there are high caves with all kinds of pictures painted on the walls. I could write a big tablet and then not tell everything. I guess you will be getting tired of reading about New Mexico, so I will tell you something of myself: I am eighteen years of age, am six feet high, weigh 155 pounds, and have blue eyes and light brown hair. I am an artist and would like to have the cousins all write to me. I can paint any kind of pictures, big or little ones.

Just a word for COMFORT: I have been taking COMFORT for several years and think it is just the grandest paper in the world. So, good-by. I will close now.

Your nephew,

BARNEY GOLDEN.

Hello yourself, Barney! How is everything up on your high mesa where you have lived since 17? You don't say whether this was 1717 or 1817, but I suppose you mean the latter date.

I certainly would like to be shown around among your old ruins, Barney. Just now I feel like an old ruin myself—having finished paying my last month's bills and having just bought a spring suit so that Bill won't be ashamed to walk in the Park with me on Easter Sunday. Your country is certainly ancient, Barney, old boy. I don't wonder you have lived to such a great age in such surroundings—since you came to enjoy the Mountain Air in 1717—I mean 1817.

I imagine you must have learned to paint from copying the works of the old masters on the walls of your local caves. Here are all our foolish millionaires paying big prices to European picture dealers for old paintings with the varnish all worn off of 'em, when the most genuine and most ancient of art can be found on the walls of New Mexico stone apartments.

Barney, when you can paint so much and so often, pictures both big and little, I think it was strangely mean of you not to have illustrated your letter in oil or water colors. Or you could have sent a "Portrait of the Artist by Himself." It would be effective to have you posed eating one of those apples from that 1717 apple orchard. So get busy and send us a tablet, either of paper or stone, covered with specimens of your Golden art. Barney, is it possible you sit up on your mesa and paint while your dad homesteads that 320 acres? If so, I'll bet there's one New Mexico homesteader whose opinions concerning the artistic temperament would not make polite reading.

HOMOSASSA, FLORIDA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I don't know hardly how to write—not knowing if my letter will be printed or go in the waste-paper basket, but I hope it will be printed. I will describe myself: I am five feet, six inches, tall. Weigh 98 pounds and have dark brown hair, grey eyes, and medium complexion. I will be sixteen years old on April 11, 1923. I live in Ozello, but get my mail in Homosassa. My father is a fisherman. We live on the coast, not far from the Gulf of Mexico. Some people call it the "Islands." Everywhere we go we go in boats. Some of you city boys and girls just fancy going to a school or to a party in a boat! Well, we do.

Do you like oysters, Uncle Lisha—or fish? If you do, come to see me and I will give you all you can eat. My sister, older than I am, has two pet rabbits. We have lots of fun playing with them. I have three brothers—12, 13, and 14 years of age. They fish with my father. He fishes mostly at night. There are plenty of wild ducks here. Do any of you like wild ducks? There are twenty-three scholars in our school. I am in the eighth grade. Oh, I got so interested in telling you all about myself that I forgot to tell you how I like to read dear old COMFORT. I sure think it has the right name. I would not miss reading one copy for anything—most especially the Leaves of Cousins. Uncle, don't you want a star fish or

Improved Farming

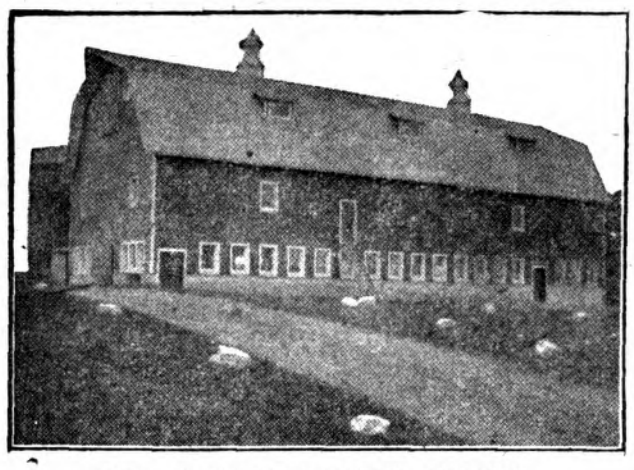
TODAY, more fully than ever before, farmers realize that farming is a business, not merely an occupation. Moreover, they realize that success in any business requires a thorough understanding of every angle of that business, and that this working knowledge be employed constantly and wisely. To draw a simple comparison, let us illustrate with a dairy farm. Consider the farm and its buildings as a factory, the dairy herd as the machinery, the feed as the raw material and the milk as the manufactured product. We may have good land, good buildings, good cows, good feed—but all of these are useless unless good practical management based upon knowledge is added in ample measure. This kind of management combines hard work with close study of every important movement having a direct bearing upon agriculture. Most farmers know all they care to about hard work, perhaps more; therefore we will confine this discussion to the big factors constantly at work to improve farming, to take the gamble out of crop production, to do away with the "ups and downs" and to bring permanent prosperity to those who till the soil.

Let us pause for a moment to consider what has taken place in the past year, and forecast, if possible, what the immediate future holds in store. Twelve months ago most of the six million farmers of the United States were just starting on the long, hard climb out of the deep valley of economic depression. With stout hearts they faced the future hopefully and "put their shoulders to the wheel" on the steep up-grade. Today, as we look backward, we find that considerable ground was gained by the vast majority. The heights that are always bathed in the sunshine of prosperity have not yet been gained, it is true. Some have fallen by the way; others are still in the valley or just beginning to climb out. But most have proved that it pays well to "stick to the ship," to plant crops as usual, and to keep working and thinking and hoping. Today we know that prices for the most important crops average higher than they did a year ago. Economists of the Department of Agriculture tell us—and they seldom guess wrong—that the total sum which farmers will receive for their crops in 1923 will exceed by a billion and a half dollars the total sum received for the crops of 1922. Sounds encouraging, doesn't it? If that forecast proves true, and we are confident it will, it will certainly mean better times on the farm, and farm folks will be able to ease up a little on the grinding economy that they were forced to practice last year.

All indications point to a further reduction in the labor cost of producing crops. A substantial reduction in freight rates is now almost assured. Interest rates already are lower and the credit strain has been eased, enabling many farmers to meet obligations and place themselves in a better situation financially. Taxes are still high, it is true, but this is due largely to the increase in local taxes over which farmers themselves can exercise some measure of control. There has been a healthy growth of farmers' cooperative marketing associations, with better management and sounder business organization. As regards helpful and necessary legislation, at no time in our history has agriculture—our greatest single industry—received more attention. Action at last seems to be replacing idle talk, for more and more apparent is it becoming that all industries stand still while agriculture is depressed. Healthy business depends upon healthy agriculture; therefore the business of farming must be running smoothly and profitably if other business is to prosper.

But when all is said and done, the responsibility for good farming and prosperous farming rests primarily upon the farmers themselves. Through legislation and administrative action the government can clear the way and see to it that the farmer receives an absolutely square deal. The government can and should make available to the farmer the sort of information which he cannot acquire for himself, but which he needs in order to produce efficiently and with due regard to the needs of the consumer. The government agencies can study marketing methods and point out how they may be improved; it can help find foreign markets for surplus crops. But farmers themselves, acting individually and collectively, must do certain things which they alone can do. Now that we have roughly classified improved farming into two groups,—first, the things the farmer can do for himself, second, the things that are being done for him by others, let us see what some of the most important of these things really are.

NOTHING TO BE ASHAMED OF IN BARN, BARNYARD OR COWS.



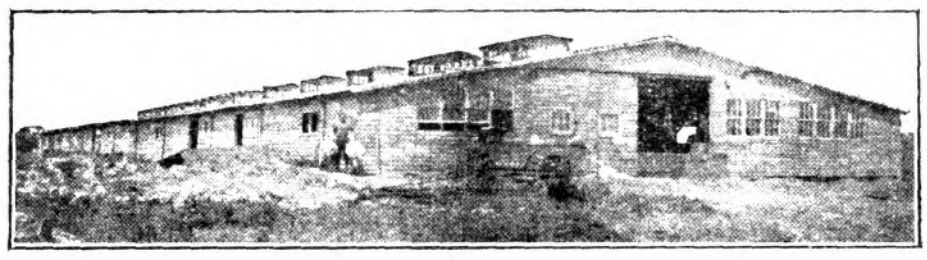
The Business Side of Farming

So far as efficient production is concerned, the farmers of the United States lead the world, but in adjusting the balance of production to meet the needs of the consumer and in marketing crops to the best advantage there is great room for improvement. The farmer cannot control his production with the nicety of the manufacturer, it is true, because farm production depends so much upon rainfall and temperature and other conditions over which he has no control. But there can be a much better adjustment of acreage than there has been in the past. Periods of over-production and under-production, of glut and famine, with ruinously low prices to the producer in the one case, and burdensome high prices to the consumer in the other, are very bad for everybody. During the past three years the hardships of farmers in a one-crop region have been apparent; over-production has been closely followed by small demand for that crop at a low price which often has fallen below the actual cost of production. Greater diversification of crops is the only cure. Even in sections where one particular crop does best, farmers should produce enough of other crops to meet their needs and the needs of their nearest markets. This is just one more illustration of the truth of the old saying about carrying "all the eggs in one basket."

Diversified farming does not mean to grow a little of everything, to dabble here and there without purpose; nor does it mean to deny the precedence due any single crop in the region to which it is best adapted. But there is no place in diversified farming, or in farming that is to be profitable for a long period of years on the same land, for the growing of a single crop to the utter exclusion of all others. Such farming is short-lived, short-sighted, and we have only to point to worn-out farms as our proof. Balanced farming wherein more attention is given to the choice of crops—yes, and livestock, too—which are best adapted to the character of soil, to the climate, and to the market opportunities reasonably at hand—therein lies the best hope for the future.

Standardization of crops where soil and climate conditions are fairly uniform will also pay big returns. There is room for vast improvement in the grading of products prior to the time of marketing. When grading is not done before crops leave the farmer's hands, it must be done afterward, and the farmer pays the bill. Potatoes serve as a good example. Over-production of this crop alone is not responsible for the low prices of the last year. Part of the fault is with those who dumped ungraded potatoes upon the market in large quantities, for the inferior quality mixed throughout pulls down the price and desirability, and makes them slow to turn, and injures everyone engaged in their production. Careful grading, with the culls retained on the farm either for home use or for feeding to livestock, and with only the strictly superior grades offered for sale, would not only reduce the surplus that goes to the market to depress the price, but it would save freight and handling charges on the inferior potatoes, and would earn an enviable reputation for the growers and the regions shipping only the best. The same principle applies in a measure to all common farm crops.

Common-sense size of farms is another thing that is well worthy of more thought on the part of farmers. Time was when the very large farm was an asset, but that was before the day of high taxes. Right now many farmers are land poor. By this we mean that more acres than can be farmed efficiently, economically and profitably, without robbing the land, are a burden upon which taxes and the interest on the investment more than equal the net returns. Thought of in this light, we find that many large farms are being subdivided. Better stock is placed upon them, a smaller acreage of crops is given better care, the soil is kept in better condition, and the final report at the end of the year is more likely to be on the right side of the ledger.

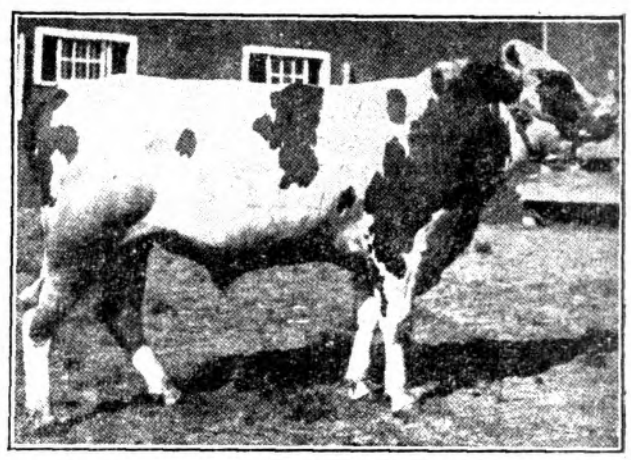


FINE BARN AND NEAT DRIVEWAY—WISCONSIN.

Advance in Livestock Industry

A more healthy condition of the livestock industry is shown by better prices which the farmer receives for his hogs, his cattle and his sheep, and by the active demand for animals of the right quality at the large marketing centers. It is shown also by the type and quality of animals received at the markets; fitted stock now is strongly in evidence, while the reverse was true during the past two or three years when "unloading" at any price was in progress. In a large measure the return to normal times is shown by the resumption of breeding operations on a pre-war scale, indicating returning confidence. The raising of work horses seems to be the single big exception to date. Here the demand will soon far exceed the available supply of desirable animals, according to dependable figures.

The shortage of young work horses and mules in the ten states which produce approximately two-thirds of all those raised in the United States—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota and North Dakota—and the practically steady demand for work animals are focusing attention upon the breeding of horses and mules in increased numbers this spring.



LARGE SHEEP BARN AT CLOVERLAND SHEEP RANCH, IRON MOUNTAIN, MICH.

More than 17,000,000 horses and mules are actually at work in harness on the farms and ranches; about 2,000,000 more are used in cities, towns, villages, lumber camps, mines and other non-agricultural lines. Horses and mules have a working life of about 12 years on the farm, if they go into harness as three-year-olds. Those used in cities on hard pavements or those engaged in other non-agricultural pursuits do not last more than nine years as a rule.

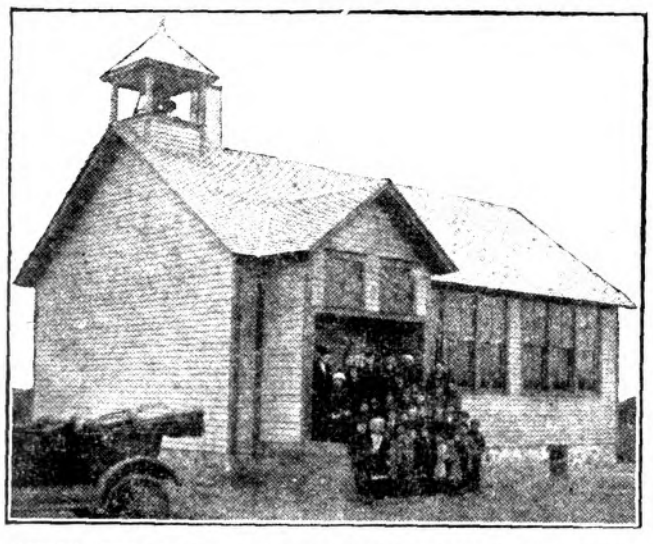
From the standpoint of actual replacements, therefore, we must have around 1,500,000 three-year-olds broken and ready for farm use each spring, while from 225,000 to 250,000 more work animals, drawn from the farms, are needed for replacements in non-agricultural lines. Therefore we need a total of 1,750,000 head annually for replacement requirements.

In 1919, 1920 and 1921 (the last years for which complete figures are available) the number of horses and mules coming three years old was about 1,400,000 head each year. These figures show plainly that we have fallen short 350,000 head a year of producing actual replacement needs. In order to make up this shortage we have had to draw on a surplus previously created, especially older animals foaled between 1910 and 1915, but this surplus is now practically exhausted. Therefore the man who has been raising good colts during the last three years will be able to benefit from the increase in prices, which has already begun, and which will probably reach its peak in 1925 or 1926.

ONE SECRET OF DAIRY SUCCESS—THE PURE-BRED BULL.

Improved Livestock Breeding

The formation of the Committee on Improved Livestock Breeding meets a long-felt need. Its purpose is to confer with breeders, to study their problems in relation to those of the packer, to acquaint breeders with permanent trends in market demand, and to bring about improvement in cattle, sheep and hogs to meet that demand. Through the work of the committee great improvement in American livestock can be brought about. This may be accomplished by taking advantage of the improvement already made by careful breeders who have kept in mind true market types that fully satisfy the agricultural conditions under which they are produced. The foundation of profit for the breeder, success for the feeder, permanence for the packer, and satisfaction for the consumer lies in better-bred livestock that will best meet the requirements of all, and that shall prove best for the livestock industry as a whole.



Supply and demand undoubtedly do determine the relative prices of different types on the market, as shown by the constant change in top prices. But breed has very little to do with the result, each breed having a section of the country to which it is best adapted and for which it is most profitable. However, the actual type of animal as to age, weight and finish does undergo change, if one is to interpret the highest-market price as indicating the kind of animal most needed. Also, the demand changes much faster than the breeder and feeder can hope to change, since the breeder's and feeder's dollar is in the animal for two or three years as compared to the very short time for which the packer or retailer has his money invested.

The qualities that make the animal best suited to the needs of the breeder or feeder are not always closely in line with the qualities best suited to market needs. In order to have a reasonable cost of production, the breeder must have animals that develop great weight for their age, possess early maturity and fatten quickly and cheaply. Almost all of these must be present before the breeder is free to devote much attention to market demand. The market, on the other hand, cares little or nothing for these qualities except insofar as they contribute to other qualities such as neatness, dressing percentage and flavor of meat. The breeder must seek health, vigor, constitution, capacity, fecundity, prepotency and many other characteristics which the market never recognizes in price quotations.

All of this leads to the single simple conclusion that the breeder must breed, in the long run, the type of animal which experience has taught him to be best suited to his needs, rather than the type that is in greatest demand at any given time on the market. But he must, for his own best interests, distinguish between "fads" and steady and permanent changes. For example, today there is a marked trend toward lighter animals; this is easily recognized, and bears every evidence of being lasting.

In the show ring the adoption of the packer's standard in judging steers, wethers and barrows, either in single classes or carload lots, is unfair to the producer. One cannot object to applying the ideas of high dressing percentage, a thick-muscled, smooth-fleshed, blocky type and a carcass of suitable size, shape and quality. But a strong protest should be offered against laying undue stress on the particular class of animal that happens to be bringing the highest price on the market at the time of showing. If this particular class always drew the highest price, no complaint could be registered, but, as has been pointed out, supply and demand tend to regulate the class that brings the highest price. High prices tend toward the development of so many animals intended to receive those prices that the market breaks for them, and another class go to the top. Therefore it is constantly changing. The safest policy for breeders to follow is to aim to produce animals that he knows will be in keeping with the permanent demand. Moreover, he should insist that animals in the show ring should win purely on their merits, regardless of the immediate price conditions as long as the best animals exhibited represented a standard market type.

Progress Made in Dairying

The dairy industry has shown steady and rapid advancement during the past year, and all indications point to even more marked progress this year. The number of cows producing 1,000 pounds or more of butterfat has grown, and a new record for milk and butter fat production has been established. Not only has the "top notcher" class been enlarged. The general average of production and quality of dairy cattle is steadily improving; scrubs are decreasing in numbers, and high grades show a well-earned corresponding increase. The good work of cow testers everywhere is pointing out the "boarder" cows that fail to pay a profit for their feed and care. Better animals are taking their places, to the benefit of the dairyman and his pocketbook. Tuberculosis eradication is making rapid strides, accredited herds being reported daily, and whole counties in the leading dairy districts are now free of this disease. Farmers themselves are learning that they should buy all cows subject to test and retest, in an effort to protect their own stock from outside contamination. As to the market for dairy produce, the upholding of the "filled milk" law eliminates the insidious competition of the "cocoanut cow" in the manufacture of condensed milk, and butterfat will bring the price it richly deserves as the purest, safest and most easily available source of vitamines.

LAWN MOWING MADE EASY WITH A POWER HOE TO DRIVE THE LAWN MOWER.

May Walker Ollie Homestead, the new champion cow, is a Minnesota Holstein. She recently completed a year's production of 1,218.5 pounds of butterfat and 31,610.6 pounds of milk. The record-breaking cow weighs 1,765 pounds, is a powerful-framed animal possessing that sound, highly organized nervous temperament that is required for great production, but also has the refinement that marks her as an excellent type of dairy animal. While May Walker was on this severe test her grain ration was made up of bran, ground oats, distiller's grains, hominy, oil meal, gluten and cotton seed with salt, and a limited amount of mineral compounds. In addition to these concentrated feeds she was given a liberal allowance of alfalfa hay, and during the latter part of the test corn silage and beets were added to the ration. According to reports of the supervisors of the test, she was in practically as good condition at the end of the test as at the beginning, though she carried a calf during six months of the time. The uniformity of the champion is further shown by the fact that in no calendar month did she produce less than 80 pounds of butterfat or 2,000 pounds of milk.

This new record displaces that of Dutchess Skylark Ormsby, former United States champion, whose production was 1,205 pounds of butterfat, a record that has stood for seven years. But for one Canadian cow, Bella Pontiac, this new record is the world's high mark in dairy production. The Canadian record is 1,587.5 pounds of butterfat and 27,191 pounds of milk.

How Science Helps the Farmer

Never before has agriculture depended so much upon science or so fully utilized its findings as today; never were the results of agricultural experimentation more needed than during the period of readjustment; never was there a greater obligation resting upon our agricultural experiment stations than during the years just past when they so regulated their activities as to aid most effectively in meeting the needs of those whom they were designed to serve. During the period of dismay and trouble the habit was formed by farmers to look to science for aid. The habit now remains, to be increasingly helpful with the passing of the years to come.

One of the outstanding pieces of investigational work carried on during the past year, and that will extend its influence over many years, is that concerning Johne's disease, a disease that annually causes losses of cattle throughout the country. Johne's disease is one of those subtle afflictions that have been introduced from Europe. It has already been found in numerous herds the owners of which were quite oblivious to the fact. The symptoms of the disease are so uncertain in the early stages that a veterinarian ordinarily cannot detect it. The animal wastes away gradually, becomes less and less efficient as a milk producer, and in time is either disposed of as unprofitable or dies in the owner's possession. The characteristic symptoms that enable the disease to be distinguished from tuberculosis are to be found only upon examination of the walls of the intestines, which in the case of Johne's disease show a very much wrinkled condition. At present experiments are under way with a new material known as "Johnin" with which herds may be tested in a manner similar to the test for tuberculosis, and in the near future we may reasonably expect that Johne's disease will be accurately diagnosed, and then weeded out of the dairy herds, to the benefit of dairymen and the dairy industry.

Comparative feeding value of white and yellow corn has also received much study on the part of trained experimentors. Already it has been clearly demonstrated that yellow corn is superior to white for feeding hogs not on pasture. It has been shown by a number of feeding trials that the yellow pigment contained in yellow corn contains vitamines necessary for rapid growth in pork production, and that these vitamines are not present in white corn in sufficient quantities to nourish properly growing animals. When hogs are on pasture, however, they secure their vitamines from their grazing; consequently yellow corn has little or no advantage over white corn for animals that have free access to good pasture. So far as is yet known, white corn is just as good as yellow for horses, dairy cattle, beef cattle and sheep, provided they are fed an ordinarily well-balanced ration containing plenty of good green-colored hay. Poultry experiments indicate that yellow corn is superior to white for chickens which do not receive in summer plenty of fresh green food, or in winter an abundance of clover or alfalfa chaff, sprouted oats, or similar green stuff.

Worldwide exploration in a search for grains, fruits, trees and vegetables that will enrich our own present available supply is a quietly conducted piece of work that comparatively few know is being done by our Department of Agriculture. Near the town of Chico, California, an "Ellis Island" is maintained for the study, quarantine and propagation of our plant immigrants. Year after year plant explorers risk their lives in the far places, in the jungles of Africa and South America, the fever-ridden swamps of Yucatan, in India, Australia, and the wild and unexplored bandit-infested interior of China. Each year new plants are shipped to the testing farm for close study; those that show desirability and adaptability are released, to become our farm friends almost without our knowing the trouble, time and money spent by our government to obtain them.

Space does not permit us to try to enumerate all of the plants that have been brought in. Let us simply say that with the exception of corn, tobacco, the pumpkin, a few species of small fruits and grapes, some native grasses and drug plants, every crop required for the manifold needs of a diversified farming industry and produced commercially in the United States has been introduced from foreign countries! Wheat, cotton, oranges, apples, peaches pears, many rare grapes, flax, hemp, sugar cane, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, rice, hops, beans, cabbage, along with thousands of others all came to the United States long ago as plant immigrants. Among the more recent introductions are: a wild peach which is resistant to alkali, cold and drought; Chinese persimmons, larger and more choice than our native varieties; aquatic food roots and vegetables which may make our swamp lands available for farming purposes; thirty varieties of timber and vegetable bamboos; many Chinese vegetables, shrubs, flowering vines and trees, including a hazel that grows to a height of about 100 feet.

Children, Our Finest Crop

The children of today are the men and women of tomorrow. On the farm, more than in any city industry or occupation, are the little ones that are growing up on our farms today responsible for the future of agriculture. To them we must look for leadership. Though this has always been the case, it is only of recent years that the facts have been admitted, and children's training has come in for anything like its fair share of attention. Now, at least, good schools that really teach not only the essential subjects but modern applied science intended for practical application to farm problems are demanded by parents in every forward-looking community. The "little red school" where the "3 R's" were taught to the tune of the teacher's ruler is a thing of the past.

In its place we find well lighted, well ventilated, roomy schoolhouses appearing in the small villages and even at the crossroads in the country; consolidated schools with even better and more complete equipment supervised by capable teachers attracting children from longer distances through the medium of school busses; rural high schools wherein boys and girls are taught livestock care and management, poultry husbandry, soil management and crop handling, agricultural botany, farm accounting, shop work including carpentry and blacksmithing. For the girls there is cooking, dressmaking, millinery, home decoration, farm health and hygiene, kitchen gardening, and business management of the farm home. Not only do these subjects better train the sons and daughters of farmers for the work they will do when they grow up if they stay on the farm; they awaken in every child an active interest in farm work, farm facts, and farm possibilities for profit that are bound to show a marked tendency on the part of those so taught to remain on the farm. That, first and foremost, is the object desired. To compete with the lure of the city, farmers themselves must see to it that their children are enabled so to study, so fit themselves, and so arrange their day dreams of the future that in every dream picture the farm is always kept in view. But how can we accomplish this end?

Visit your school! We are willing to wager that not one farmer in ten, perhaps not one in fifty, ever visits the school that his children attend unless "maw drags him to graduation exercises." There is no job that will pay him better than to visit the school, get acquainted with the teacher, see how work is conducted and how the pupils spend their time. The day is long gone when any farmer can afford to take schools for granted, as he does taxes, election day and the seasons of the year. The teacher will appreciate the interest you show. She is doing her best, too often without cooperation, to make her school the best in the country. She is, as a rule, the most patient, conscientious, underpaid worker of all our nation's salaried wage earners. The country's future citizenship is in her two little hands. Tied, though they may be by "red tape," quarrelsome school boards, antiquated theories of education, and laboring along on her own inadequate salary, she nevertheless is doing a wonderful work. She is trying to hold her pupils through interest, instead of through their fear of the hickory stick or the more recent truant officer. When she needs new equipment for this or that, don't turn a deaf ear, then wonder why the children's interest lags. You are not mowing your grain and hay with a cradled scythe—but grandpa did.

Times have changed in education, too, and the change requires more and better "machinery" for school work. See that it is provided. Authorities on the subject have said that each day's work in school is worth $10.00 to the pupil. With forty pupils in school, see what a load of responsibility each teacher carries every day of the school year! How much more could each day be worth with every condition at its best? The entire school system is in a state of growth. Great changes are coming fast, but all such progress depends upon the intelligence of the public, upon you home folks in every school district. Keep "posted" on school matters. Visit your school. Assure the teacher that you are in sympathy with her ideals, her best efforts. Promise her your wholehearted support wherever the best interests of the school and its pupils are concerned. Do it whether you have children or not. That is good citizenship.

An Everpointed Pencil For Only One Subscription

Reward No. 8851
The American public and COMFORT's million readers have waited a long time for this perfect writing pencil. Without hesitation we can pronounce the Everpointed, the newest product of the American Pencil Company, the most superior self-pointing pencil on the market.
In appearance it looks like solid gold but is not gold nor is it brass. It is "gilt nickle," the latest metallic substance. The more you carry it the brighter it gets. It cannot wear out nor can it wear off. With its delicate chasing and flashing jeweled top it makes one of the most beautiful pencils you ever saw.
It is as useful as it is beautiful. If you carry an Everpointed your lead is always sharp. No more soiled fingers. No more whittling. The Everpointed is always ready for use. Nothing to get out of order. It writes right every time. A slight turn and a fresh lead is ever ready.
Twelve perfect universal size leads—sixteen inches of lead in all—are contained in the magazine under the top—enough for a year's ordinary use. New leads are simply pushed in from the front, as illustrated. A convenient eraser is also concealed under the cap.
The Everpointed comes in two lengths, one of 5½ inches for men, with a safety clip; the other 4 inches for women. Specify which model you prefer.
Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50c we will send you an Everpointed pencil by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8851.

Don't wait for somebody else to take the lead. It may never be taken. Remember that better education is the purchase price of better future agriculture.

April Showers and Flowers

HOW beautifully colorful the garden is now—if we have taken a little time and pains to set out early flowering bulbs, protect them from severe winter weather, then uncover them and watch them defy the cold, raw days of spring to bloom on the very receding edge of snowbanks. The borders of walks, yes, and even the very lawn itself, may be radiant with crocuses almost before the grass begins to show green. Snowdrops demurely droop their graceful, pretty heads beneath the lilac bush or in other sheltered nooks where snow has banked deep, white protection all winter long. Tulips and lily-of-the-valley will soon be breaking into bloom, but as yet the tiny pearl-like bells and the gorgeous bowls of color are but a promise held in trust by the green leaves. Some gardens may brag of hyacinths; many will be those which present jonquils and daffodils for the admiration of all. Nor may we overlook the wildflowers, so easy to bring in from the wooded hillsides to grace some corner with spring beauty. "Hardy" is the middle name of the trillium, the mandrake, anemone, Jack-in-the-pulpit, violet, hepatica and any numbers of others. When their only cost is a little time in finding and digging out and replanting in the garden, why is it that we so seldom find farms where wildflowers are set out to gladden us right beside the doorstep?

Spring Care of Fences

As soon as the frost comes out of the ground in the spring is the right time to repair or rebuild fences. At this season the extent to which frost has heaved fence posts is first apparent. The soil has not yet dried out sufficiently to permit spring plowing to begin, so there is time to devote to fence repairing. A little work done now will be amply rewarded in freedom from aggravating delays and from crop damage during the ensuing season.

Instead of cussing and fretting about that "shiftless neighbor's 'breachy' stock that roam the countryside at will, while he himself turns his back"—to quote the refrain of a common annual lament—let's remember that only a small part of our fence troubles can be blamed on someone else. Before we point at the sins of others, therefore, let us make sure that we are safely out of the wrong kind of neighbor class ourselves. Also remember that "breachy" stock are more likely to be the result of poor fences than an outcropping of malicious cussedness on the part of cattle, for cows learn to break through fences by being invited to do so by fences that are not stock-tight. No cow, with a healthy appetite and a disposition to satisfy it, will respect a decrepit row of sagging posts held up by a few festoons of rusty barbed wire. She goes through! Once the habit is acquired, it is a hard one to break. Let's prevent it by keeping the fences in good order.

Put a good cutting edge on the shovel and post-hole digger, plane off a smooth handle on a six-foot piece of two by four to serve as a tamper, hunt up the hammer, wire stretcher, some staples and nails, perhaps an old pair of gloves, then go to work.

If heaving of posts set in low land has not been so great as to cause sagging and lost alignment, resetting is a simple matter. Posts that have heaved six inches or less may be readily driven back into place with a post maul or sledge. Do not try to drive them down by swinging the maul from the ground. Hitch a team to the heavy wagon, have the boy drive the team along the line of fence, stand at the back end of the wagon box and drive each heaved post into place as you pass them in order. It will save a lot of time and backaches.

Space does not permit us to go into details regarding every phase of fence repairing and building, but a few "do's" and "don'ts" may be worth while.

Don't consider fence repairing as a chore. It is an art that requires knowledge, patience and careful attention to the many little things.

Don't drop new posts into old post holes. When a rotted post is removed, dig out the hole large enough to permit careful and thorough tamping.

Don't think that tarring, creosoting or charring the butts of fence posts is a waste of time. It adds many years to their life, and saves much work and money for the farmer.

Don't buy poor, cheap fence wire; consider quality ahead of price; get wire not smaller than a No. 9 for best results.

Don't buy good wire then stretch it poorly. We have seen a farmer trying to stretch wire with one hand, his foot braced against a post, while he droye staples with the other hand. Ordinary fence wire will stand a pull of several thousand pounds. A team, a tractor, a block and tackle, or a high-tension stretcher are required for good work. A pull of a ton or so will usually serve. "Do it right or do it twice" is a good motto for fence builders to keep ever in mind.

Spring Pigs Need Good Care

Probably half the losses suffered by the average pig raiser could be prevented by greater care and a very little expense, and such a saving would pay large returns on the small cost involved. One of the principal causes of losses in young pigs is the lack of good shelter. Too many sows farrow in dirty, dusty, dark sheds where the small pigs must struggle for existence among accumulated filth and disease germs. Dust irritates the lungs, causes coughing and inflammation and paves the way for so-called lung worms. Scours, which causes many deaths among small pigs, is caused by disease germs which thrive in filth, contaminate the sow's udder, and gain entry into pigs' stomachs at nursing time.

A cheap and certain remedy for the vast majority of pig troubles is a farrowing house, small if funds are limited, and larger if more pigs are kept on the farm. Elaborate houses are unnecessary; the main consideration is that they be so built that they can be kept clean, dry, light and well ventilated. A small, dark, damp hog house is an inducement to permit filth to accumulate. Keep only the number of brood sows that can be given good care. It is far better economy to keep and feed a few sows that will have a chance to raise good litters than to keep too many sows, then have each raise only three or four pigs to weaning age. From a purely business standpoint, there is no sense in feeding sows the whole year around, then have each one perform up to about half efficiency.

Exercise is necessary to keep young pigs from contracting "thumps." Deprived of exercise, pigs put on too much fat around the vital organs, pressure upon the heart and lungs results, and the jerky abdominal contractions commonly called thumps are the consequence. Few cases can be cured. Plenty of exercise is the best preventive.

Why Oats Lodge

There is no variety of oats that will not lodge, nor is there any fertilizer that will entirely prevent lodging, though we have all heard much talk of varieties of oats that will not lodge and of lodge-preventing fertilizers. Lodging of oats is a condition brought about by many factors, the most important ones being the season and the soil.

It is true that some oat varieties have stiffer straw than others, but if the season is hot this makes little difference. Hot weather causes nitrification to take place rapidly in the soil; rapid growth of soft, succulent leaves and "watery" stalks result. Such plants are quite susceptible to lodging by strong winds and heavy summer rainstorms. Excessive rainfall will also cause lodging, as every farmer has learned to his sorrow. If the soil is very fertile it may be best to get in two crops of corn before oats is sown, thus using up part of the surplus nitrogen. Wheat following corn before oats also helps prevent the latter from lodging. On virgin soil as found in newly cleared timber regions, or on prairies plowed for the first time, lodging is uncommon for the reason that under sod there has been very little nitrification taking place.

Controlling Rosy Apple Aphis

The proper time to spray for rosy apple aphis is just as the tips of the leaves of the fruit buds protrude about one-half inch. When large plantings are to be treated, leeway must be allowed for spraying so that it may be completed in time. If the blower begins spraying when the leaves have protruded about one-fourth inch and finishes the job before they are entirely free from the bud he may feel certain of controlling the rosy aphis of the apple for that season, provided of course that other requirements have been met. If the spray material is applied at scale strength after the leaves have become free from the bud, considerable "burning" will result, nor will all the aphis be reached because of the protection afforded by the leaves.

In certain seasons a warm spell may be accompanied by rains and high winds which prevent spraying but cause the leaves to develop rapidly. Under such conditions the buds may reach a stage where injury will result to the young foliage from the spray if used at scale strength. Nevertheless, the spray should be applied, for the injury to the foliage will be insignificant as compared with the damage that will result from failure to control the aphis. Fortunately, the blossom buds are covered with a dense down which protects them from injury by strong spray. In combating the rosy aphis, it has been found safer to be a little late than too early, as this species in some cases makes its appearance only as the leaves show good growth.

A spray mixture that combines efficiency, economy and safety to both the trees and the operators is as follows: Lime-sulphur, two and one-half gallons; nicotine sulphate, three-fourths pint; water to make 100 gallons. In addition to controlling aphis, this mixture materially assists in checking apple scab. Make certain that the under sides of branches and buds are reached. Careless spraying has but little value.

Alfalfa Pasture Management

Alfalfa pastures for swine cannot be excelled—but their excellence depends largely upon the management they receive. Given a fair chance, based upon a thorough knowledge of the habits of growth of the alfalfa plant, such pastures will stand excessive pasturing; denied this consideration they will soon become bare-bitten and useless.

Alfalfa should not be pastured in the spring until it is from seven to nine inches in height. If pastured while the plants are very small and tender, and while the ground is still soft and wet (these conditions usually go together), the setback received is seldom overcome entirely, and may even result in severe loss of plants with bare spots as the visible proof.

No alfalfa field intended for pasture should be pastured during the first season, as most growers know; but even during the second season pasturing should be light. Never should the field be allowed to present the regular look of a pastured area. Light pasturing, with hogs removed to another pasture from time to time to permit a "breathing spell" for the young plants, is never injurious, but constant pasturing is almost certain to result in harm. To keep plants in good condition and to stimulate growth, clip two or three times during the second season with a mowing machine.

During and after the third season, alfalfa pasture will withstand heavy pasturing without damage. The only care needed is to clip with the mower in case young pigs have allowed certain areas of plants to become large and woody. When this happens, other parts of the pasture receive more than their share of attention. Strive to keep the entire pasture in the same condition and stage of growth.

MINERALIZED WATER ROUTS CHICKEN LICE

Tablets Dropped into Drinking Founts Banish Vermin, Make Fowls Grow Faster and Increase Egg Yield.

Any poultry raiser can easily rid his flock of lice and mites, make chickens grow faster and increase their egg yield by simply adding minerals to the fowls' drinking water. This does away with all bother, such as dusting, greasing, dipping and spraying. The necessary minerals can now be obtained in convenient tablets, known as Paratabs. Soon after the fowls drink the mineralized water, all lice and mites leave them. The tablets also act as a tonic conditioner. The health of the fowls quickly improves, they grow faster and the egg yield frequently is doubled. Little chicks that drink freely of the water never will be bothered by mites or lice.

The method is especially recommended for raisers of purebred stock, as there is no risk of soiling the plumage. The tablets are warranted to impart no flavor or odor to the eggs and meat. This remarkable conditioner, egg tonic and lice remedy costs only a trifle and is sold under an absolute guarantee. The tablets are scientifically prepared, perfectly safe, and dissolve readily in water.

Any reader of this paper may try them without risk. The laboratories producing Paratabs are so confident of good results that to introduce them to every poultry raiser they offer two big $1 packages for only $1. Send no money, just your name and address—a card will do—to the Paratab Laboratories, Dept. 869, 1100 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and the two $1 packages, enough for 100 gallons of water, will be mailed. Pay the postman $1 and postage on delivery, and if you are not delighted with results in 10 days—if your chickens are not healthier, laying more eggs and entirely free from lice and mites—your money will be promptly refunded. Don't hesitate to accept this trial offer as you are fully protected by this guarantee.

Ducks and Baby Chicks

JUDGING from the letters I have received during the last few months asking for information about duck raising, our readers are awakening to the fact that there is money in ducks.

The first point for the beginner to grasp is the difference in breeds, for not all ducks are money makers. There are quite a number of breeds, the principal of which are Pekin, Aylesbury, Rouen, Crested, Indian Runner and Muscovy.

The Pekins are creamy white, with reddish orange shanks and feet, and weigh at maturity, drakes, eight pounds; ducks, seven. The Aylesbury are pure white, shanks and feet, light orange; drake, nine pounds; duck, eight. The Rouen drake's head and neck are green, with a white collar. Body, ashy gray, mixed with green. Breast, purplish brown; underbody, steel gray. Weight nine pounds. The ducks are principally light brown, penciled with darker brown and green; weight, eight pounds. The Crested are pure white ducks with pronounced white crests or topknots. Drake weighs seven pounds, duck six. There are two varieties of Muscovy—the pure white, with a red wrinkled skin on their faces, and orange shanks and feet; the colored Muscovies have black and white heads, with the same odd, wrinkled skin on their faces as the white ones. Their backs are blue black, sometimes broken with white feathers; shanks and feet, from yellow to dark red color, or even black. Drakes, ten pounds; ducks, eight.

There are also two varieties of Indian Runner ducks—one pure white, the other light fawn and white or gray and white. The fawn and white are the most popular among breeders. The side of the face should be fawn or gray; throat, pure white; breast and shoulders, fawn or gray, running to white; tail, fawn or gray. Drakes weigh four and a half pounds, ducks, four.

When we come to market purposes, we narrow down to Pekins and Indian Runners; Pekins being preferred, in most markets for table birds, and they are certainly the most profitable for that purpose, because they grow up very quickly, being ready for market when six to nine weeks old, when they will weigh from four to six pounds apiece, if they have been well fed and kept in yards away from streams and ponds; and in the wholesale market they bring about eighteen cents a pound.

As egg producers, Indian Runner ducks are the wonders of the poultry world, for they have outstripped all records. One breeder in Indiana, who had three hundred and fifty birds, affirms that on January 25 he commenced shipping eggs for hatching, and sent out thirty-six thousand by July 25th, and that each duck (the stock consisted of three hundred ducks and fifty drakes) averaged ten dollars a year, the average yield being ninety-nine eggs for each bird in one hundred and eight days. In New Zealand a two years contest was conducted, one duck laying five hundred and twelve eggs in twenty-three months, and was still laying an egg a day, even though she was moulting. They are strong, healthy, easy to raise, develop very rapidly, and will, under good conditions, commence to lay before they are five months old.

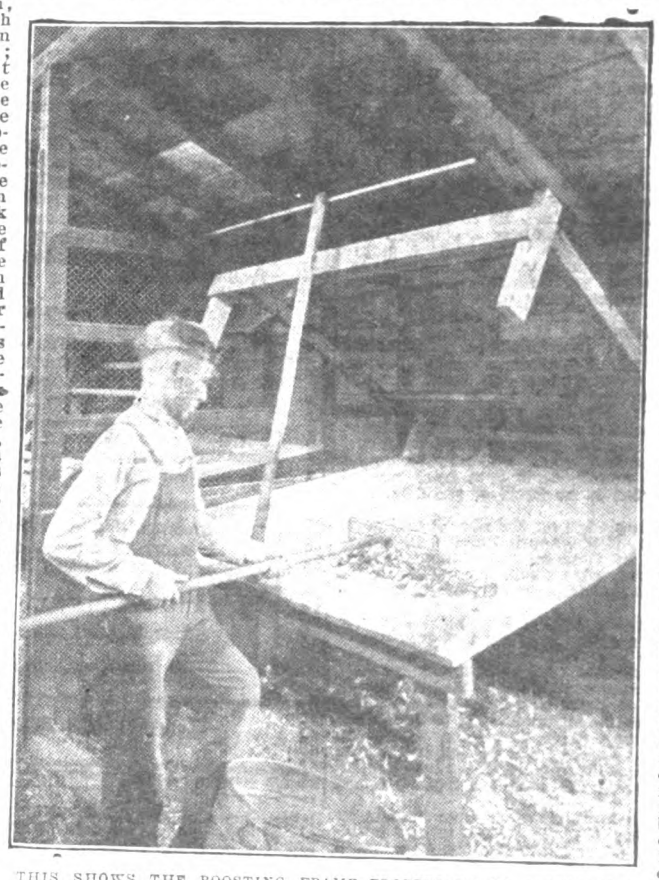
There are many points in favor of duck culture, as they are free from lice, roup, scabby legs, and other diseases common to chickens.

These ducks are hardy and vigorous, and as their chief characteristics are their laying qualities, they have come to stay, and the one who gives them special attention will realize a good profit from them in the future.

Running water is not at all necessary to their development, but they must have plenty of clean fresh water for drinking purposes. They are great foragers, and find part of their food when given free range, and can be successfully handled in limited quarters. A two-foot fence is sufficient to enclose them.

One of the secrets of success is to start with pure-bred stock, for blood will tell with ducks as with other poultry.

Keep one drake for every seven or eight ducks and fatten the rest for market when nine or ten weeks old. At this age we dress them and sell them to private parties for sixty and seventy cents each. Some work, but it pays. But eggs are what you should work for, and the flock should be large enough to enable you to market them by the case.



To get winter eggs, laying ducks should have an enclosed house, but after May they do better if allowed to run out all the time, but should be penned at night until nine o'clock the next morning, when they will be through laying for the day. The eggs are larger than hens' eggs, and they command from five to ten cents higher than hens' eggs in the commercial markets.

Laying ducks should be fed a damp mash composed of bran, shorts, corn meal and beef scraps twice a day, with whole corn at night. Never feed quite all they will eat. Sand and oyster shell must be provided and kept before them all the time.

The first few days ducklings should be fed bread soaked in milk or water, squeezed dry and sprinkled with sand. After two days feed a mash of corn meal, bran, low-grade flour and beef scrap. They must have sand as well as feed, and this must be within their reach all the time.

Remember to provide green stuff of some kind in each feed after they are ten days old. This not only cheapens the feed, but insures good health. We like green cut clover best in summer time. Give all feed in troughs, and fresh water several times a day.

Ducks are such bad mothers that it is better to hatch their eggs under hens or in incubators. The first few eggs a duck lays in each season are seldom fertile. Eleven are a full setting, and it requires twenty-eight days for their hatching. Examine the nest for two or three days after setting the hen, for bad eggs. A weak germ that dies causes the egg to decompose, and the odor once smelled can never be forgotten.

THIS SHOWS THE ROOSTING FRAME PROPPED UP TO ALLOW THE DROPPINGS TO BE CLEARED.

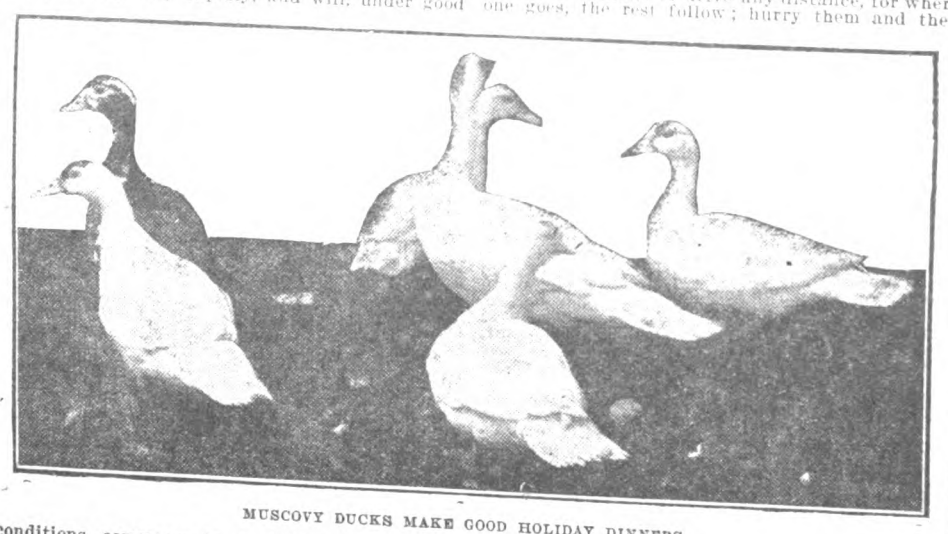
Examine the nest when the hen comes off to feed, and take away the eggs that are dark and mottled. If you fancy an egg looks wrong, pick it up and smell it; that and its sticky touch should assure you, for the egg is porous. If you have been using an incubator to hatch chicks, you can test with a proper tester, and this must be done all the time from the fourth to the fifteenth day.

When the hatch is over at the end of the twenty-eighth day, have ready a box about a foot deep and three feet long, the top cut out and one end taken off. Place the open end against the coop door, so making a little run, with a board floor covered with an inch of sand or dry earth. Baby ducks need even more protection from damp than chicks; therefore, if the weather is bad, keep the coop and run under cover; and if fine, the shade of a tree is necessary for the little fellows can't stand the full sun. After a week the hen may be removed, but keep them within bounds, on short grass, not letting them out until the dew is gone.

For twenty-four hours feed nothing. First week: Half a pint of rolled oats, some cracker or stale bread-crumbs, two hard-boiled eggs, chopped fine, half a cupful of coarse sand just moistened with milk. Feed four times a day just what they will eat in ten minutes.

Second and third weeks: Half a pound of ground oats, the same of wheat bran, one-fourth of a pint of corn-meal, the same of coarse sand, two tablespoons of beef meal, a pint of finely cut green clover, rye or cabbage moistened with scalded milk. They must be fed four times a day.

Fourth to sixth week: Boil a quart of hulled oats for an hour, add a pint of corn-meal, wheat bran, half a pint of grit, a tablespoonful of charcoal and a pint of clover. Feed three times a day.



They should be ready to kill the eleventh week.

Do not let the ducks, young or old, get frightened if you can possibly help it. They are nervous things. No matter what you feed, if they are frightened or made to run daily, they will not fatten. If you go about them gently, they are the easiest things to drive any distance, for where one goes, the rest follow; hurry them and they will scatter, and it is good by to them for hours.

The feed for those to be kept for stock is the same up to three weeks old, but from that on one quart of green feed, one quart of bran, half a pint of grit and half a pint of beef scraps. Mix moist with milk, water, sour milk or buttermilk, and feed night and morning. If on free range, this is all they want. If not, you must add clover or vegetables, and feed three times a day.

Always remember, in looking after chicks, that they are infants, and as sensitive to cold, neglect or improper feeding as a human baby. You know that when a baby is clean, warm and well fed, it will be contented and happy, but let anything go wrong with it and it squirms and cries. Well, it is just the same with chicks. Go into a brooder house in the evening, when everything is settled

Science's Discovery Routs Chicken Lice

Mineralized Water Gets Rid of Dusting or Spraying — Birds Delouse Themselves. Fine for Baby Chicks and All Poultry.

A recent discovery promises to revolutionize all the commonly accepted methods for keeping poultry free from lice and mites. This wonderful product keeps the poultry always lice-free without the poultry raiser doing any work. It is the simplest, easiest, surest and best method ever discovered.

Hick's Lice-Go, which is the name of this remarkable lice remedy, is dropped in the chicken's drinking water. Taken into the system of the bird, it comes out through the oil glands of the skin and every louse or mite leaves the body. It is guaranteed to help the hatchability of the eggs and cannot injure the flavor of the eggs or meat; is harmless to chicks and does not affect the plumage. A few days treatment at the start and then a little added to the drinking water each month is all that is necessary.

Send No Money—just your name and address to Chas. M. Hick & Company, Dept. 311, 1018 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. A card will do. Mr. Hick is so confident that Hick's Lice-Go will get rid of every louse or mite that he will send you two large double strength $1.00 packages for the price of one. When they arrive, pay postman only $1.00 and postage. Sell one to your neighbor and get yours free. If you are not absolutely satisfied after 30 days trial, your money will be refunded. This offer is guaranteed by two big Chicago banks, who say that Mr. Hick will do exactly as he agrees without question or argument. Write today before this remarkable trial offer is withdrawn.

Try the New Way To Kill Lice

A hen worried to death with lice cannot lay if she wants to. You might as well "throw money to the birds" as feed high priced food to lousy chickens. It's a dead loss—don't do it. Use Licemist. No dusting, no dipping no painting. HANG UP THE BOTTLE. It acts like magic. Testimonials from every State in the Union tell of wonderful results from its use. Simply put a few drops in nests and on roosts and hang uncorked bottle in the coop or hen house. Powerful fumes leave the bottle in vapor form, and penetrate feathers, cracks & crevices everywhere. Lice, mites, chiggers, bed bugs, ants, roaches, etc., have no lungs—they breathe through the pores of the body, and are destroyed by Licemist vapors. It will not injure chicks.

Each acre of alfalfa pasture should carry 20 pigs of around 100 pounds weight, or their equivalent. Old hog raisers usually figure that each acre of pasture "will feed a ton of pigs" of any weight, if the pasture is in good condition. In dry seasons keep close watch of the pasture condition, giving a rest with a change of pasture in case it is needed. Rooting should be prevented by ringing, though pigs will not be inclined to root severely while there is plenty of feed. Only when the pasture becomes closely cropped is the tendency to root severely likely to be noticed, and at this time a change of pasture of a couple of weeks will be welcomed by both the pigs and the pasture.

Frost Resistant Corn

Frost resistant or cold resistant corn has now passed beyond the experimental stage and become a recognized means of fighting Jack Frost. In Wisconsin, where this new strain was developed by Prof. B. D. Leith of the Wisconsin Agricultural Experiment Station, 12,000 acres of this welcome addition to the crop lists was grown in 1922. That it is meeting with a warm welcome is plain when it is remembered that cold resistant corn is a new thing, that it has only been available in commercial quantities for two or three years, and that now the demand for seed exceeds the supply.

"This has been a great year for the new cold resistant corn," says Prof. R. A. Moore, head of the Department of Agronomy, Wisconsin College of Agriculture, and nationally known for his life's work of corn improvement. "Throughout our northern and northeastern counties, and in frost pockets, in other regions, it has made a fine growth, in many cases growing even taller than the native varieties. The long, cold spring season proved the worth of the new variety to many farmers who have been in doubt. A June frost that did considerable damage in some districts failed to affect the new corn; a few leaves sloughed off, but normal growth continued, and apparently this corn did not even receive a setback."

The new cold resistant variety can be planted earlier in the spring, thus getting started ahead of the varieties formerly grown in regions subject to frost. It germinates at somewhat lower temperatures, does not suffer from cold and wet weather, and resists late spring frosts that have always delayed the planting of other varieties. The new variety grows a much larger stalk and matures somewhat earlier than Golden Glow. It is an excellent silage corn, but large quantities are now being grown for seed to meet the increasing demand. Last year some 3,000 bushels were sold, part going to Minnesota and North Dakota farmers.

Insect Pests Spread Quickly

The remarkably rapid and general spread of newly introduced insect pests causes surprise as well as alarm on the part of investigators who are giving their time and attention to means of control or eradication. And well it may. For example, the Japanese beetle:

This insect was introduced into the United States in 1916, and first found in a nursery near Riverton, New Jersey. The rate of increase, in spite of attempts to prevent its spread, has been remarkable. In 1916 about a dozen beetles were found; in 1919, in the same locality, a person could easily collect by hand 15,000 to 20,000 in a day, and as many as 250 larvæ to the square yard! The infested area in 1916 covered less than a square mile; in 1917 the area had increased to 2.7 square miles; in 1918 to 6.8 square miles; in 1919, 48.3 square miles; in 1920 it had crossed the Delaware River into Pennsylvania, and had infested 103.3 square miles; and in 1921 it had spread over 270.1 square miles. Reports for the year 1922 are not yet available. Consider the spread in less than five years from less than one square mile to more than seven townships, and this in the face of opposition from Government entomologists, farmers, nurserymen, and market gardeners who were well aware of the danger. Truly, from small beginnings can develop remarkable things, both bad and good.

Other important examples of insect pests—unwelcome immigrants—that in a comparatively short time have gained wide distribution and have done immeasurable damage are: Brown-tail moth, Gipsy moth, pink bollworm, San Jose scale, Mexican bean weevil, Camphor scale, European corn borer, sorghum webworm; and a number of others.

From the foregoing statement, let every farmer judge for himself, first, the need of the Government work being done to safeguard his crops from insects already here and from others that are striving to gain entry from other countries; second, that where quarantine or combative measures are requested, his complete cooperation is essential and entirely to his own advantage.

Refilled Feed Sacks

Refilled feed sacks bearing false or misleading statements have been found by inspectors of the United States Bureau of Chemistry, and purchasers are warned of the danger they run when they buy refilled bags. Several feed dealers are refilling used feed bags stamped or printed with the name of the manufacturer and the brand name of the feed originally contained in the sacks. In such cases the names and brands are not true in reference to the feed in the sack after refilling, the actual contents often being of a very inferior grade.

A feed dealer in Iowa was recently cited to a hearing under the Food and Drugs Act for shipping in interstate commerce a molasses feed in bags which he had refilled, but which still bore the name of another feed manufacturer. These sacks also bore a brand name under which the original owner of the sacks sold a stock feed of much higher grade than that with which they had been refilled.

The Federal Food and Drugs Act does not require the name of the manufacturer or the brand name to appear on sacks of feed coming under its jurisdiction, but if the name of the manufacturer and the brand are given, they must be true. The use of statements that are false or misleading in any particular constitutes an infringement of the law. In short, all labels must be absolutely truthful in their statements, not only as to contents but also as to name of manufacturer, if given, and feed dealers are cautioned regarding the handling, selling or sacking of feeds contrary to this law. Moreover, inspectors are on guard for just such infringements, in an attempt to safeguard the interests of farmers, and appropriate action will be taken in all cases coming to their attention.

Egg Producing Feeds

To stimulate egg production in hens of the general purpose breeds such as Plymouth Rocks and Wyandottes, a mash that is less rich in corn-meal and meat scrap should be fed, according to findings recently published by the United States Department of Agriculture. Apparently the rich mashes fed to Leghorns and others of the smaller egg producing breeds are not intended for the larger breeds, and a considerable reduction in these ingredients has given best results on the department's poultry farm at Beltsville, Maryland.

Best results were obtained with a mash containing only 18 per cent. of meat scrap and ground oats and wheat bran. The mixture is made of three parts of corn-meal, one part of wheat bran, one and one-half parts of meat scrap, one part middlings, two parts ground oats and one and one-half parts linseed meal. This ration kept hens in prime laying condition, did not allow them to become overfat nor impair their breeding condition and produced a good yield of eggs.

Leghorns and other smaller breeds can be fed a heavier and more stimulating ration without endangering their physical condition and the hatching quality of their eggs. The mash that has given the best results for these breeds is made of four parts wheat bran, four parts middlings, 66 parts corn-meal and 26 parts meat scrap. Barred Plymouth Rock pullets, however, when fed on this ration laid few if any more eggs than those fed the mash recommended for that breed, but they suffered in health and their eggs were lower in fertility.

Among the vegetable proteins fed to poultry, the department has found that gluten meal seems to be the best, although cottonseed and peanut meal are satisfactory if supplemented with animal protein in the form of meat scrap, tankage, fish meal, or milk, and with mineral salts. Vegetable protein should not exceed 10 per cent. of total mash. Tests have demonstrated that a good grade of fish meal is practically as good as meat scrap of high-grade tankage.

Paint Poisons Cattle

Some time ago a case of paint poisoning of cattle came to our attention that may serve as a warning to our readers.

The interior of one of the best dairy barns in the Middle West had been repainted. Not only the walls and ceiling, but the stanchions and pens had received coats of paint as well. And there arose the trouble. Cows in stanchions were hardly able, even if inclined, to lick off the new paint, but calves running loose in the calf pens were free to taste. They tasted, they liked the sweetness of the fresh paint, they licked it off and several very valuable animals died of paint poisoning.

This is only a single illustration, but such instances are by no means uncommon. It seems that even on the best regulated farms the calves have the run of the place. In a sense they are privileged characters. Is it any wonder that, as we saw recently in our daily paper, two calves had died from licking the paint off a wagon-box and a set of sleds newly painted and set up on saw horses out in the orchard where they would be away from the dust?

An interesting example of paint poisoning comes to us from Missouri, where a breeder of Aberdeen Angus cattle lost several animals before the true cause of their deaths was ascertained. The poisoning symptoms were present, but as the cattle were on pasture there was little thought of paint being the cause. The pasture was carefully examined for poisonous plants but none were located. After the cattle had been placed in another pasture another search was made. Finally a small bucket that at one time contained white lead, but that had been licked clean by the cows, was found. This was the answer to the riddle.

Moral: Be careful where you throw the old paint cans. Don't let the calves run loose to sample the fresh paint on wagon-box, barn or fence. Cattle don't believe in signs; "Fresh Paint" means nothing to them. Keep them away from it and avoid loss.

Don't Overfeed Before Shipping Stock

Reports showing excessive shrinkage on shipments of livestock received at central markets often cause complaint to the United States Department of Agriculture by members and managers of co-operative livestock shipping associations. In some cases these complaints are justified; frequently the shrinkage feature is pointed to as a weakness in the whole system of co-operative marketing.

While many things can, and frequently do, result in excessive shrinkage in livestock, investigations have shown that at times it is at least partly due to a disposition on the part of some shippers to overfill their stock before loading. This custom seems to be a relic from the days before co-operative shipping came into vogue and when most small producers sold their stock to country buyers. Under the system of marketing wherein the producer sold his livestock on a basis of home weights, or on a basis of shippint point weights, it was usually found to be to the producer's advantage to obtain a generous "fill" on his stock before turning it over to the country buyer.

Under the co-operative system of shipping so common today, however, the incentive to excessively "fill" at home or shipping point is practically eliminated. Stock that is fed heavily just before loading is not only quite likely to be stricken and sometimes die while in transit, but will seldom take as good a "fill" when it arrives at market. Furthermore, where co-operative shipments are graded at the shipping point, the man who has given a heavy "fill" receives more than his just proportion of the net returns. Home grading of co-operative shipments is, in most instances, highly desirable, but it can be successful only where the individual members "tote fair" with each other. In other words, it works only where members really co-operate. When we consider that the man who "fills" heavily before shipping is likely to sustain losses en route to market and upon arrival, we feel that there is a strong argument against overfeeding before shipping.

down for the night, and if everything is all right, they will be lying stretched out, and you will hear little twittering sounds of perfect content. If the brooder is not warm enough, or the day's food has contained anything irritating, they will be standing up, huddled together, and uttering sharp little sounds, which are unmistakably cries of trouble. Cultivate the habit of noticing such signs, and be guided by them, for a happy chick is a healthy chick, and a healthy chick makes a profitable bird.

Chicks must have nothing to eat for the first thirty-six hours, for just before they break their shell the remaining part of the yolk is drawn into the chick's body, and must have time to digest and be assimilated before any other food is introduced, or the digestive organs will be overtaxed and bowel trouble is likely to result.

As soon as they are placed in a brooder some fine gravel or very finely cracked poultry grit should be strewed about. I like the gravel that is sold for caged birds for the first two or three days, as it is bright and attracts the little fellows to pick it up, and in this way they get the material that is needed to enable the gizzard to grind feed when it is given to them. After the thirty-six hours' fast, put a small pan of sour skim-milk before them, and, to teach them how to feed, pick up one or two and dip their bills into the milk. If a few commence to eat, the others will follow suit. Of course, the milk, like the water that is given to chickens, must be put in dishes that are partly covered, to prevent them from getting into it. For the sour milk we use small fruit saucers with a strip of board across the top, so that there is only a small opening left on each side of the dish.

At the end of half an hour the milk is taken away and two hours later they have their first real meal, which consists of stale bread which has been dried in the oven and put through a meat chopper. One cup of this is mixed with two eggs which have been hard boiled, cooled and chopped, shell and all. About one-third of that mixture is poured along a narrow board and given to fifty chicks. If any is left at the end of half an hour, it is removed. The following day, sour milk and the above mash is alternated at intervals of two hours. After that, the sour milk is left before them all the time, the mash given in small quantities every two hours.

On the fourth day they have water given to them for the first time. The fountain is left in the coop for half an hour in the morning, and the same length of time at about 2 P. M., and a little rolled oats which has been broken fine is scattered on the floor of the coop.

The fifth and sixth days are the same as the fourth, except that the dish of water is left before them all the time. After the sixth day we commence to use rolled oats instead of the dry bread in the mash, and liver or lean meat which has been parboiled gradually takes the place of the egg, and chick feed is scattered on the floor three times a day. All these changes must be accomplished very gradually from the sixth to the twenty-eighth day, and of course the quantity given must be increased, for chicks are very fast growers. In fact, there is no young creature, except squab, that grows so rapidly during the first two weeks of its life as a chicken, and for this reason chicks require an abundance of easily digested, nutritious food, and to keep the system in proper working order it must be supplied in small quantities very frequently.

After the fourth day, never leave mash before them more than fifteen minutes at a time, and don't make more than is needed for one day at a time, or it may sour and cause trouble; besides which, if it is left before them all the time, they will have no inducement to scratch and hunt for the chick feed.

From the fourth to the eighth week we keep a dry mash before them all the time in self-feeding hoppers, or they will not eat this as greedily as they do the soft mash. Give them all the fresh green stuff they will eat at noon. Young alfalfa and clover leaves are good. If you have neither, use the green sprouts of oats.

The dry mash is the same as that used at the New Jersey Experiment Station, and is composed of the following grains:

Wheat bran, 50 pounds; gluten feed, 10 pounds; corn-meal, 10 pounds; ground oats, 10 pounds; meat scraps, 10 pounds; dry ground bone, 10 pounds.

I wish to call special attention to the value of sour skim-milk in baby chick raising. Sour milk is very palatable; it also contains much food value in its casein, which is a form of protein or nitrogen. The greatest benefit, however, lies in its disinfecting qualities. The lactic acid present kills and prevents the multiplication of intestinal bacteria. White diarrhea is one of the most dangerous of these forms. In order to get the greatest benefit from sour skim-milk it should be given the youngsters to drink from the very first day, being given in a closed vacuum fountain so that the chicks cannot get their feathers soiled from

Science Finds Way to Stop White Diarrhea

New Discovery Makes It Easy to Raise All Your Chicks. Chicks Keep Healthy---Make More Money

Through the use of a recent discovery, the dreaded disease, White Diarrhea in chickens, can now be completely controlled. You can raise all your chicks, keep them healthy and vigorous and double your profits.

Mr. Connelly, State Line, Wisconsin, says: "Your wonderful discovery is the best White Diarrhea medicine I have ever used. It is the quickest to stop the disease and absolutely prevents it from starting. Hick's White Diarrhea Tablets are helping me raise more and better chicks than ever. It is so easy to give." Simply dissolve one tablet in a quart of water. The chicks drink it eagerly and even droopy and lifeless chicks quickly go chirping about full of pep. Cannot injure the youngest or weakest chick.

Send No Money—just your name and address to Chas. M. Hick & Company, Dept. 812, 1018 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. A card will do. Mr. Hick is so confident that Hick's White Diarrhea Tablets will save your chicks that he will send you two large double strength $1.00 packages for the price of one. When they arrive pay postman only $1.00 and postage. Sell one to your neighbor and get yours free. If you are not absolutely satisfied after 30 days' trial, your money will be refunded. Do not hesitate to accept this offer as it is guaranteed by two big Chicago banks, who say that Mr. Hick will do exactly as he agree without question or argument. Write today before this remarkable trial offer is withdrawn.

Various Types of Vacuum Tubes

AMONG the numerous questions we receive each month there are more regarding the various types of tubes than any other one piece of apparatus. It is little wonder that the newcomers in the radio field are puzzled at the multiplicity of numbers and letters by which these various types of tubes are designated.

The tube most common in the present radio receiving sets is known as the Raditron. There are several different types of these tubes and each type has a special function in the set. The first tube necessary to operate a receiving set is the Raditron U V 200 and is called the detector tube because its function is to detect the incoming signals and transform them into audible signals. In case there are amplifiers in the set it is necessary to employ one or more Raditron U V 201 tubes, and these tubes are known as amplifier tubes. In appearance the above mentioned tubes are identical, but the construction is slightly different. The detector tube is only partially exhausted while the amplifier is very highly exhausted. This will also explain why a detector tube is sometimes called a "Soft" tube and the amplifier a "Hard" tube. Both of these tubes have a tungsten filament and burn very brightly, similar to an incandescent lamp. Although these tubes are in general very efficient, there is a great variation and some tubes will not function at all. In case one of these tubes does not function and yet the filament lights as usual it is an easy matter to get a replacement from the dealer from whom the tube was purchased. These two tubes require a six-volt current to light the filament and this is usually supplied by a storage battery of that voltage. Many of our readers have asked if it is possible to use the lighting current with a step-down transformer to light the filament of these tubes. Of course, if the proper voltage is obtained, the tubes will light, but there will be a very disagreeable hum in the phones due to the alternating current, and this hum will nearly drown out the music or voice. Dry cell batteries may be used, but will last only a very short time and will prove very inefficient. The plate voltage, or "B" battery voltage, on the detector tube should range from twenty-two volts down to twelve volts, depending on the characteristics of the tube. The plate voltage of the amplifier tube should be at least forty-five volts and may run as high as one hundred volts. The average amplifier tube works very well on forty-five volts.

The next size of Raditron is the U V 202 and is the smallest transmitting tube used. This tube is exactly the same in construction to the receiving tubes excepting in size. It is about the size of a 40-watt lamp and resembles it in shape. These tubes are seldom used in receiving sets, although sometimes they are employed in power amplifiers. The filament voltage on these tubes is eight, and the plate voltage may be as high as 350 volts. Many of these tubes are in use in both radio-telegraph and radio-telephone sending sets by the many amateurs, both in this country and abroad.

The Raditron type U V 203 is not common to the radio broadcast listener, but the dream of every amateur is to own one of these "power bottles," and there are many of these tubes now used by the more advanced amateurs. The tube is commonly called a fifty-watt transmitter for this is the power rating of the tube. It is much larger than the U V 202 which has a power rating of five watts and usually these tubes are amber colored instead of clear like other tubes. This tube is also used in many of the broadcasting stations and it is nothing short of a wonder that one of these slender bottles is capable of transmitting music and voice over hundreds of miles. Some of the smaller broadcasting stations use the five-watt tube, but the range of these tubes is not great and we cannot hear these small stations unless fairly near to them. The filament current for this tube is ten volts and the plate voltage as high as one thousand volts.

Last, but not least, in the Raditron group we have the type U V 204 or the 250-watt tube. This tube is used only by the larger amateur stations and the large broadcasting stations. It is much larger than the fifty-watt tube, being about 25 inches long and having a round bulb in the center. These tubes are very expensive and only the large stations with long range employ them.

Within the last few months the "Peanut" tube or W D 11 Aeritron tube has come into great prominence and there are so many requests for information in regard to this tube that we will give as complete description as possible. The chief reason for this tube being so popular is because of the fact that it uses only one dry cell battery to light the filament, thus doing away with the storage battery which is a considerable expense and nuisance. This tube requires a special socket or may be used in standard socket if an adapter is used. It may be used as a detector or amplifier, and is nearly as efficient as the Raditron, if not more so. The tube is not considered critical and may be used for Radio as well as Audio frequency amplification. As a detector, it will operate with a plate voltage of about 22½, and as an amplifier it requires at least 45 volts. As high as 60 volts may safely be used on this tube. These tubes are very quiet in operation and their economical points make it very desirable. At the present time it is the lowest current tube on the market, although there will be one placed on the market soon that will be even lower current consumption than this tube. The new tube will be known as a U V 199 and will be one of the Raditron type.

Note.—In the January number, referring to diagram of wiring up set, the tickler coil is misprinted as "Tickler Bulb," and caused a lot of mixups. Please bear in mind this correction, for there is no such thing as a tickler bulb.

Questions and Answers

Q.—W. E. K., New Baden, Ill.—Please tell me the length of a meter in feet.

A.—A meter is equivalent to 39.37 inches or a little over three feet.

Q.—L. Y., Petersburg, Ind.—How far is it possible to receive music on a radio receiving set which uses one dry battery to light the filament? Is a "B" battery used with this type set?

A.—The type WD-11 tube which requires only one dry cell battery to light the filament, is capable of receiving music over a thousand miles if it is used in a properly designed set.

Q.—M. S., Lincolnton, N. C.—What is an electrolytic detector? What is a magnetic detector? How far can the sound be detected over either of these detectors?

A.—An electrolytic detector is composed of a fine platinum wire with the tip end making light contact with a cup of acid. A magnetic detector is one of the oldest types and consists of a wire passing between the poles of a permanent magnet. Both of these detectors are obselete, and it is doubtful if they would work at all in reception of music. A good crystal is much better.

Q.—Antigo, Wisconsin. I have a regenerative set and it works best when I hold a pencil on the output of the variable grid leak. Should a set as described be able to receive California? I have heard these calls and would like to know what stations they belong to: S X A K, W J A X, W I A I, W M A K, W D A C, W F A A, W O S, W J A G, W M A P.

A.—We cannot tell just what your trouble is unless we have more details. Better try a grid leak of greater value. The stations you ask of are as follows: S X A K—Wittenberg College, Springfield, Ohio. W I A I—Heer Stores, Springfield, Mo. W M A K—Northern Laboratories, Lockport, N. Y. W D A C—Illinois Watch Co., Springfield, Ill. W F A A—A. H. Belo & Co., Dallas, Tex. W O S—Missouri State Marketing Bureau, Jefferson City, Mo. W J A G—Huse Publishing Co., Norfolk, Neb. W M A P—Utility Battery Service, Easton, Penn.

Q.—A. W., Clarkesdale, Mo.—Would a lightning rod be a good ground?

A.—Yes. But not advisable to use without a good protective device.

Q.—A. C. B, Westport, Tenn.—Can one use the WD 11 tube with the set you are describing in the December COMFORT with the same tube socket which takes the tube requiring a storage battery? Is the range of the WD 11 tube as great as other tube? What is the life of the tube? Will it amplify? Can one use the Armstrong super-regenerative circuit in receiving without having a license? May WD 11 tubes be used in this circuit?

A.—Yes, WD 11 tubes can be used in the set we are describing in COMFORT, but in order to use the same sockets an adapter will be necessary. The range of the WD 11 tube is rated at 80 per cent. that of the Raditron tube. The life of a tube depends, to some extent, upon the brightness at which it is burned, but the actual life of a tube cannot be stated. Many tubes last for years and the WD 11 tube should last as long as the average. It is as good as an amplifier as a detector. We have no data on the WD 11 tube being used in the Armstrong super set. No license is required to use any receiving circuit unless the set is made to sell.

Q.—H. H. M., Vallonia, Ind.—Referring to diagram of your set in January issue of COMFORT: I do not understand the wiring diagram. I notice there is a "Tickler Bulb" illustrated and I do not understand what sort of a bulb it is and where it is to be mounted. I notice that there are two different types of tubes on the market. Does it take a detector tube or an amplifier for this set?

A.—Your question is very welcome as it calls our attention to a mistake in the diagram you refer to. The particular instrument you refer to should be labeled Tickler coil, not bulb, and it is the coil located inside the aerial coil and is mounted on two brass shafts. The connections to this coil are made through the brass bearings. A detector tube is necessary for this set.

Q.—L. A. T., Rochester, N. Y.—Sorry we cannot send copies of this set except in magazine form. Your question is answered in answer to question by A. C. B., Westport, Tenn., in this issue.

Q.—F. R. C., McNair, Miss. Can a 20-volt generator be used in place of a "B" battery, and a 6-volt generator in place of an "A" battery, on a regenerative receiving set?

A.—Yes. However, there must be some sort of filter circuit to make the current smooth or a lot of noise will be heard. The filter circuit consists of two choke coils, one in series, with each generator. A condenser of very high capacity should be connected directly across the generator leads.

Q.—G. H. L., Barlow, Ky.—Would you advise a patent on the enclosed detector?

A.—You would not be able to obtain patent rights on this detector, for it does not deviate from those now held on this detector by the Wireless Specialty Co.

Q.—R. F., Norfolk, Neb. Sometimes when I am listening to a radio station that I can hear very clearly, it will fade out until I can hardly hear it and then it will come back again. I would like to know the cause of this.

A.—Everyone has this same experience, and there are several theories advanced as to the cause, but it is generally accepted that it is caused by the atmospheric conditions and also by two waves from different stations heterodyning, or even in some cases neutralizing each other for a short period.

a sea horse? A star fish is something just like a star. When you put it in the sun you can dry it and keep it. I will send you one, Uncle, or any of the cousins who will write to me. I will send you my picture, too. So some of you cousins, please write.

Well, I guess I had better stop, or there won't be room in the whole COMFORT for my long letter. Good-by and love to all.

Your niece and cousin,
CATHERINE BROWN.

Do I want a sea horse, Catherine? That's very kind of you, but it all depends upon whether he is well broken to saddle and how much it would cost to keep him in Brooklyn. It is very different up here from down in Homossa, you see. There you can probably feed all your sea horses on sea weed and wild rice, and stable them on the sand between a couple of handy rocks. Up here in Brooklyn I'd have to hire stable room and buy all my sea oats. There are always wild oats to be obtained in the big cities, but the sowing of them is a little difficult. All sea food is expensive here and to try and feed such a horse six quarts of oysters a day, for instance, would keep me nearer bankrupt than I already am. Then there is the question of giving the animal enough exercise. I would not have time every day to take him for a gallop in the surf at Coney Island. And then I'm not sure I'd like to get a mouthful of sand and salt water each time he kicked up his heels in the waves. Also Bill might be jealous and make difficulties. So probably it would be better for me to refuse this sea horse, Catherine, and have you send me a star fish instead. This will not cost anything to keep and, in fact, if it is not too dry I can make soup out of it some Friday or put it in a chowder. Did you ever eat fish chowder, Catherine? It is a famous New England delicacy and used to be eaten

Sweet Grass Basket

For Your Sewing And Fancy Work

WHERE is the woman who does not "just love" these beautiful Sewing Baskets made of sweet grass? Their delightful fragrance which is practically everlasting is like that of flowers. they are handsome in appearance and very strong and serviceable, being hand-woven by the Indian Regis Indians of Canada, who produce the finest hand-made baskets in the world.

Of ample size—eight inches in diameter and three inches deep—and with its close-fitting top this sweet-grass Basket is just what you need in which to take along your sewing or fancy work when calling or visiting. And at home it holds your work, along with scissors, buttons, thread and other necessities, so that you always know just where to look for them. And the Basket itself is such a beautiful ornament for any room.

New Thin Model

The Leonard "Earl" Watch

Reward No. 7557

For A Club Of Seven

AFTER searching the market for a reliable, up-to-date timepiece for our men and boy readers, we selected the Leonard "Earl" because we believe it is the best watch in the world for the money. The case is composition nickel-silver which wears as well as solid silver, a 12 size, open face, thin model with antique bow and flat crown. The movement is guaranteed American made, stem wind, pull-out pendant set, with pure white dial and plain, easily-read Arabic numerals.

As shown in our illustration, the "Earl" has the classy appearance of a $25.00 watch and after testing it we find it to be an excellent timekeeper. We therefore feel no hesitancy in recommending the "Earl" to any man or boy who wants a watch that is not only a good timekeeper but a "good-looker"—a watch that you can show your friends and carry anywhere with pride and satisfaction. It is yours free if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Leonard "Earl" watch free by parcel post prepaid. With it you will also receive a factory guarantee allowing you to exchange it for a new watch if it does not prove entirely satisfactory. Reward No. 7557.

Automobile Lights

In cooperation with the various States, the Bureau of Standards is investigating the proper illumination of registration plates on automobiles and the efficiency of various forms of tail lights. The general subject of the color, position, etc., of tail lights is now receiving considerable attention throughout the country. The Bureau is also engaged on work covering automobile headlights with the idea of aiding in the unification of state laws governing these appliances.

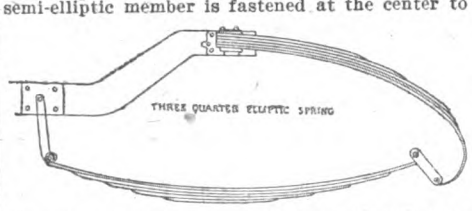
Spring Forms



THE leaf type spring has become commonly adopted for automobiles. Several leaves of different lengths are assembled together to form a spring of the desired strength. Coil springs are not so well suited for this purpose as are the leaf type due to the coils being very sensitive to every shock. While this may at first appear to be a desirable quality, it cannot be overlooked that the vibrations continue for some time. The leaf type spring is stiff in action as the leaves rubbing against each other create considerable friction. This spring does not yield to every little shock and when it does yield it does not continue in action for a great length of time as does the coil type. The leaf type serves well for cushioning the load and provides the desirable riding comfort. Common forms of the leaf type spring are known as the semi-elliptic, three-quarter elliptic, full elliptic, cantilever, and platform. The semi-elliptic has its center fastened either above or below the axle while the two ends are boled or shackled to the frame.

SEMI-ELLIPTIC SPRING

The three-quarter elliptic is a combination of semi-elliptic and quarter elliptic members. The semi-elliptic member is fastened at the center to the axle. The front ends of the semi and quarter elliptic members are fastened to the frame.

The full elliptic spring consists of two semi-elliptic springs joined together. The center of one semi-elliptic is fastened to the axle and the center of the other semi-elliptic to the frame.

The cantilever spring is usually fastened at the front and center to the frame while the rear of the spring is fastened to the axle.

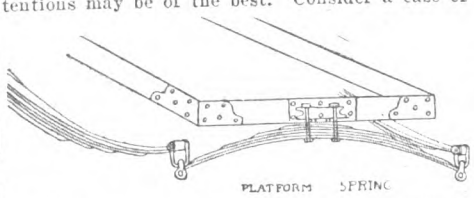
The platform spring is a combination of three semi-elliptic members. Two of the semi-elliptic members run parallel with the frame while the third semi-elliptic member is inverted and is fastened to the two parallel members above referred to. The manner in which this spring takes the load will be readily understood from the illustration.

Uniform Laws



Automobles collect a large death toll each year. A great percentage of this toll can be attributed to reckless and careless driving. There are those people in every walk of life who seem to delight in anything that does not come within the law—which brings to mind the old saying, "He who dances must pay the fiddler." However, we will pass by the willful lawbreaking class and consider those who desire and endeavor to be law-abiding.

For the man who drives a car, it is not always easy to be strictly law-abiding, although his intentions may be of the best. Consider a case of a driver who plans to make a tour of several states. He is accustomed to the rules and regulations governing traffic in his own and neighboring cities. He experiences no difficulty in driving wherever he may desire in this territory. The moment he leaves this prescribed territory he realizes the strange sensation of not knowing how to proceed and still heed the laws of the community.

At home, the law may require that an automobile shall not pass a street car while passengers are entering or leaving. The particular community in which he now finds himself may not have this requirement. To play safe, he now stops his car while the street car is taking on passengers. In many cases he immediately becomes the target of other motorists who accuse him of holding up traffic or cast remarks at him about being an old woman, etc.

The fact is that an out-of-town driver does not know what to do in order to be law-abiding. Laws are not uniform in all states, and neither are they uniform in all cities of the same state.

For example, when operating in a strange city how is a driver to know whether he can turn around in the middle of a block, pass a street car while it is taking on or letting off passengers, stop close to a semaphore or crowd over to the right when desiring to make a turn, use an exhaust horn or bell, run through a safety zone if passengers are not there, use a spot light, etc.? These are a few of the many things on which the laws of different cities vary greatly.

Then there is the case of headlights. Some states have a list of approved dimmer lenses, and to operate with unapproved lenses is unlawful.

Again, I ask: How is a tourist to know whether he is right or wrong? True, he could obtain the rules and regulations of the towns and cities to be touched in his trip, but such a course is anything but desirable. A driver becomes accustomed to the traffic rules of his community. He takes what might be termed chances due to his knowledge of what the law requires the driver ahead or in the rear to do. If a strange driver fall into the line of traffic, it will be easily understood how an accident may be caused by his not working in harmony with the other drivers. The strange driver does his best and intends to play safe, but accidents will continue to be caused by cautious, law-abiding drivers until steps are taken to bring about a more uniform set of rules relative to a few traffic conditions.

Helpful Pointers

Clear Vision

Several inquiries have been received at different times relative to a preparation which can be applied to the windshield so that water will not collect on the glass and obscure the vision. Personally, I have tried some of the formulæ that were sure to do the trick, but I have yet to find one that satisfies my idea of clean vision. While I will admit that in most cases the water did not settle, it drained away in streams that obscured the vision much worse than the raindrops. My experience has been that telephone poles were made to look as if they were falling, oncoming cars seemed to cover the road, and as a last resort I would term myself "Rain-in-the-Face," as I strained for a look around the windshield in order to get my bearings. It is my belief that the best way to insure clear vision is to install a well-made windshield wiper. There may be better methods, but I don't know them.

Wrong Connection

Should you remove the storage battery from the car and when desiring to replace it not know which cable connected to the positive pole, try connecting the cables without stopping to figure out whether you are right or wrong. After connecting them switch on the lights. If the ammeter shows a discharge-reading, the connections are O. K., and you guessed right the first time. However, if the ammeter records a reading on the charge side then the cables are not properly connected and they should be removed and reversed.

Night Driving

Should night overtake you while driving in unfamiliar territory, and should you feel nervous about suddenly coming to a sharp curve which might cause you to run off the road, it is good policy to drive with extra caution until someone comes along to take the lead. Providing the newcomer is not a speed demon you should be able to keep about 200 feet in the rear. Even though you may not be able to see his car clearly you can watch his rear light, also get some benefit from his headlights. You will be able to know the condition of the road from the action of his car, and thus place considerable less strain on yourself. Trailing a car a trifle closer than 200 feet makes driving much easier when glaring headlights are on the road. While the fellow in front is fighting a light duel, his car is protecting you from the glare. Keep your car under control as the fellow in front may run his car off the road or may decide to stop; in either case you must be prepared to bring your car to a stop.

Release the Brakes

After coming to a stop in traffic and awaiting the signal to go, it is a good plan to release the brakes. Should another car strike the rear or front of your car, the damage to your machine would not be so great as would be the case if the brakes were set so that the impact could not set your car in motion.

Freeing Stuck Pistons

The owner may be surprised to find that the pistons are stuck if the car has been allowed to stand during the cold weather. Kerosene is one of the fastest acting agents for the freeing of stuck pistons. Pour a liberal amount of kerosene on the top of each piston. This liquid is thin and penetrates between the piston and cylinder wall and loosens any matter which might be binding the piston to the cylinder wall. In the absence of kerosene obtain some very light cylinder oil and heat it. Use in the same manner as you would kerosene. Do not expect immediate results as considerable time may be necessary for it to penetrate the obstructing substance and loosen up.

Use New Gaskets

Some engines are equipped with valves fitted in removable cages. Should the cages be removed for the regrinding of the valves it is good policy to throw away the old gaskets on which the cages bear and install new gaskets. New gaskets insure against leaks and is money well invested.

Piston Displacement

Determined by finding the area of a circle whose diameter is the cylinder bore and multiplying the product by the stroke. Example bore 3 3-16 inches; stroke 5 inches. Solution: 3 3-16x 3 3-16x.7854 equals 7.9799. 7.9799x5 (stroke) equals 39.8995 cu. in. displacement of one cylinder. If the engine has six cylinders the displacement is: 39.8995x6 equals 239 cubic inches.

Answers to Inquiries

TROUBLE WITH LIGHTS.—I have a 1916 model Ford. For the last few months most every time I have driven in the night I have burned out from one to three light bulbs. The lights at times will flicker, get very bright and then dim. They always go out when running on high gear. I use 9-27 bulbs, and have tried 12-16, but the latter are too strong. I have tried new wiring and new lamp sockets and everything I could think of, and the local garage mechanic has tried to find the cause of the trouble, but all with no success. Can you suggest any help?

H. K., Fowler, Ind.

A.—Providing your lights are wired in series, you are using bulbs of sufficient voltage to carry the load. However, if the lights have been changed to the parallel system, 18-volt bulbs will be needed. If, as you say, you have installed new wiring, I would suggest a careful inspection of the insulation. Look at the light connectors to be certain that the wires do not touch each other. Make sure that every connection is tight.

SUDDEN LOSS OF POWER.—I would like to know how a machine, Ford, December, 1918, model, would act if it had been burnt. The other day I run a distance of eight miles, and when I stopped it was so awful hot, radiator boiling, and would not have pulled any further, I believe. There I put in oil and came the remaining two miles all right, though the mud was just as bad, but no hills to pull.

The next day we went several miles in mud and it would hardly pull its own weight, although the engine seemed to be working hard enough, but hadn't the power. Before it had been an exceptional puller, and could hardly choke down.

I should have said the oil was leaking, owing to a piece of gasket being left out in some repairs the day before. Do you think the bearings or connecting rods are burnt, and what would be the best thing to do?

There is no knock or anything wrong except loss of power.

MRS. M. M. R., Zanesfield, Ohio.

A.—Try the compression of each cylinder separately by turning the engine over slowly with the hand crank. Lack of oil and overheating, such as your motor experienced, can cause scoring of the cylinder bores and warping of the valve faces and seats. Remove the cylinder head and examine the cylinder bores for scratches. If you find scratches the cliinders must be reground and fitted with oversize pistons and rings. If the scratches are deep, this may not be possible. If the valves and their seats have been burned, the seats must be recut and new valves fitted.

USE OF HYDROMETER.—Please explain the use of a hydrometer? (2) What should a 6-volt battery register with a hydrometer? (3) How full of water should a 6-volt storage be kept?

T. D., Pink Hill, N. Car.

A.—The usual manner of determining the condition of the battery cells is by testing with a hydrometer. If a hydrometer was placed in water of 60 degrees it would sink until the scale registered 1.000 at the surface of the water. This is the standard used to compare the weight of other liquids. If the liquid is lighter, the hydrometer will sink deeper and if the liquid is heavier, the hydrometer will not sink as low. The cells are in good condition if the hydrometer readings are between 1.250 and 1.300. All cells should be filled with distilled water to a level one-half inch above the top of the plates.

REPAIRING CRACKED CYLINDER.—There is a crack about six inches long in the front end of the cylinder wall of my engine. Please tell me if there is any way to repair it without sending the engine to the factory.

R. R., Badger, Minn.

A.—There are some preparations which can be spread over a crack and harden in air. However, the repair is not as durable as would be the case if you had the cylinder welded. An expert handler of the welding torch should quickly fill in the crack so you will experience no further difficulty.

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

DEAR, dear, such doleful letters, hundreds of 'em, all a deep dark indigo. It isn't fair, here I am almost in tears—and I'm a mess when I cry—just when I've been invited to have lunch with a perfectly scrumptious man. He'll never ask me again. Now see what you've done, ruined my chances for giving you a nice Uncle Marion!

But to be serious, and I do have my serious moments, I am giving the troubled ones, and those who think they are troubled, a little prayer-poem for consolation.

A Prayer

By Elizabeth Lincoln Gould.

"Grant us, O Lord, the grace to bear
The little pricking thorn;
The hasty word that seems unfair,
The twang of truths well worn;
The just that makes our weakness plain;
The darling plan o'erturned;
The careless touch upon our pain,
The slight we have not earned;
The rasp of care, Dear Lord, today,
Lest all these fretting things
Make needless grief, O give, we pray,
The heart that trusts and sings."

MILLY, Illinois.—No, Millicent or Mildred or whatever your name is—never did like Milly—no, don't let the boys kiss you. I've been warning girls against kissing, promiscuous kissing, for more years than I care to count, and still they ask. Some vary the question by asking timidly if just one kiss matters. Don't you know that kissing a girl is like opening a bottle of olives—if you can get one the rest come easy.

MARY JANE, Kansas.—I am sorry, dear, that life in Kansas, your part of it, anyway, is so dull. Some clever person once said that every day is a dull day for dull people, but I can't quite believe that. Your letter doesn't indicate that you are dull, far from it. More, I should say, that you haven't any special purpose in life.

"Live for something, have a purpose,
And that purpose keep in view;
Drifting like a helmless vessel,
Thou cans't ne'er to life be true,
Half the wrecks that strew life's ocean,
If some star had been their guide,
Might have now been riding safely,
But they drifted with the tide."

—Whitaker.

Don't drift with the tide. Do something, keep busy, and always have something planned to do tomorrow. Don't ever get up with the feeling, "I wonder what I'm going to do today." Read, study, do housework, have a garden, help other people. You will find enough to do if you just look around a bit and "use your bean." That's an awful expression, I know, after such a nice poem by Mr. Whitaker, but I do things like that—serve corned beef and cabbage with angel cake!

FERN, Ark.—"High tempered and reckless" aren't the best qualities for a husband to possess, and your father is right in objecting to him. Aside from these qualities, his predilection (grand word—I don't use it very often!) for cheap associates (female) is enough to condemn him. Don't lose any sleep over his "sorrowful eyes." Maybe he has a tummy ache or an ingrowing nail. For that matter, sheep have the most sorrowful eyes of anything I ever saw, but it doesn't mean a thing; they are really quite cheerful.

HELEN, Minn.—Your letter has been referred to the Etiquette Department. Look there for an answer. This applies to various other communications.

EVELYN, Carolina.—Don't give up your position unless your employer persists in annoying you, and I don't think he will the second time, now that he understands you better. Just forget what he said to you and go on about your work as though nothing unpleasant had occurred.

RUBY, Indiana.—Don't say, "have went." I am not a purist, whatever that is, something like a Methodist, I think, but there are some things I don't like. I don't know what your friend's work is, but if I were a boy, and in love with a girl, a mere trifle like five miles wouldn't keep me from her. However, you know the circumstances and I don't, but before you give up any good times make sure he isn't going around with other girls. I don't like to know of a fellow putting anything over on a girl.

GRACE, N. Carolina.—Don't elope, and don't ask your father and mother if you can get married. If the man, boy more likely, you want to marry hasn't courage enough to ask your parents for you, what sort of a husband do you suppose he will be? Besides, whether he asks or not, sixteen is entirely too young to get married.

UNDECIDED GIRLS, Missouri.—See answer to Grace of N. C. No, don't use rouge and powder, it is ridiculous on children of fourteen and fifteen. You should be spanked and put to bed. Rouge and powder, now, will ruin your skin, and by the time you are grown up you'll look like old ladies.

SONNY, N. Y.—It would be better perhaps to "drop" the out-of-town fellow to whom you are engaged. You can't care very much for him if you go out four nights a week with another fellow. Don't be all broke up, though, if your home town fellow drops you after he has been in college a while. Better provide yourself with a nice soft cushion in the shape of another fellow, for between two stools you're likely to come to the ground.

DIMPLES OF N. DAKOTA.—Ask advice and help of your married sisters. Tell them the farm work is too hard for you. Maybe they will intercede in your behalf. If not, tell your father you are not strong enough to do a man's work, and, if he insists, tell him you've got to have a man's pay. That ought to get him.

RUTH, N. C.—Are you marrying him for his money? If you are, be sure he has enough to make it worthwhile, and, if I were a girl of eighteen, it would take a lot of money to make me marry a man twenty-two years older than myself, unless he were an exceptional man and I were very much in love with him. I can't advise you not to marry him for you might be happier with him than with a man nearer your own age.

O., North Carolina.—Most people are more or less jealous, but if he is of the wildly, insanely jealous type, think twice, and then some more, before marrying him—and don't marry anyone for four years.

MR. C. L. B., North Carolina.—The fact that she does not go with any other fellow and that she says she loves you ought to be convincing enough. What do you want her to do—get down on her knees to you? Are you sure you are so very loverlike your own self? You must take your financial prospects as well as your age into consideration before considering marriage. What have you to offer her besides your doubting self?

FRANCES, Kentucky.—"Is it wrong to go with strange boys?" It depends, Frances, on how far you go. Don't do it, then there will be no regrets. (2) Why waste perfectly good kisses on a boy who doesn't love you even though you love him? Not much thrill to a kiss like that, I should think.

BLACK-HEADED GIRLIE, Kentucky.—I'm giving you the benefit of the doubt, B. H. G., though being in love with a boy of seventeen shouldn't make a schoolteacher of twenty spell wait with a final "e", and until with two "ls". It isn't done by the best school teachers. Give the poor boy a chance to grow up before you grab him.

GREENIE, Miss.—If you can obtain a good teacher in shorthand and typewriting, I'd advise that rather than a business course by mail, but a good correspondence course is better than a poor, or even an ordinary teacher. Your writing is very good, and your spelling very good indeed, and that's the important thing. I feel sure you will be successful. If I can help you I'll be very glad to do so.

My best to you all.

things; read, learn the ways of the world, study people and forget you can't add and subtract. I have heard mother say she got her education from newspapers as she was married young and couldn't even get good books.

Don't get the idea that I do not believe in schools. Far from it, and I want my children to get arithmetic and everything else they must get at school. Would like to see letters on this subject.

MOTHER OF THREE.

FALL RIVER MILLS, CALIF.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

We have had COMFORT in our family for a long time and couldn't get along without it.

I am married and have two little girls. One was three years old last August and the other a year old last January. I am sending you my little girl's picture. Her name is Frances Shirley.

I enjoyed reading Mrs. Marsh's letter and wish she would come again. If any of the sisters ever come out here they must visit the P. G. & E. construction for it is beautiful work. The big tunnel is not far away. It is three miles long. When it is completed it will furnish water for a big power house.

Sincerely, MRS. L. R. KEENER.

FRANCES SHIRLEY KEENER.

HUMBOLDT, R. R. 8, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND DEAR COMFORT SISTER:

Mrs. Wilkinson, don't you think that the sisters who accuse you of writing all the letters do so in order to have you print their letter?

I am five feet, one inch tall and weigh 97 pounds, red headed with grizzly grey-green eyes and a big nose and you know the rest—freckles, I mean. I have a cheerful optimistic nature generally but sometimes I feel blue and depressed and again when everything goes backward I feel like getting out and butting a tree. Now please don't anyone refer to me as the fellow who "grins when everything goes dead wrong," for I never did have much use for him. He always seemed to me a lazy sort of fellow who when the cows ruined the turnip patch, and the hens scratched up the garden, or when wifey cut two sleeves for the same armhole, from the "barely enough" to make the best dress, sat around whittling and grinning like a 'possum.

Of course I think COMFORT a grand paper. Who doesn't? My mother used to take it and then I enjoyed the cousins' letters and short stories best, but since I am in a home of my own I find more to interest me in the Sisters' Corner and the beautiful designs in fancy work, especially the crochet patterns. Let me tell you I believe COMFORT is the "fairest and squarest" paper published.

I used to so much want to write for Uncle Charlie's page when I was a girl but could never get my letter just right. I can think of much to say but it sounds differently when it is written. COMFORT always seemed so above and beyond me when it came to contributing but always so friendly and understandable to read.

I am twenty-six years old, have a good husband, two children, John Henry, five; Doris Hope, three and a half. Little Mary (as I always speak of her), who would have been seven but she was called beyond the stars when she was eighteen months old.

I have a request to make of some kind-hearted sister. My husband's mother is in ill health and cannot get away from home very much. She reads a great deal and years ago she read a serial in COMFORT entitled "Milly Howell"; or, The Heiress of Beechwood," and she is very anxious to secure it in book form. I would like to get it for her and would appreciate any information that would lead to obtaining it, and would return favor.

Have any of you had any experience in resilvering mirrors? I have one that needs it badly but I don't know how to do it. Can anyone give me any help?

I would like to hear from all who care to write. I know I can pick enough strawberries to buy stamps to answer a great many letters.

Love and best wishes to all.

MRS. LOTTIE M. CARTER.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Dear Uneducated Mother, I fear unless you are firm your child will soon think she is superior to you. Point out to her firmly that it is you who is giving her the chance you never had and that she should be grateful to you for that chance. The fact that your friends do not notice your lack of education speaks of a natural refinement and aptitude that lack of education did not destroy and while an education is absolutely necessary, kindness of heart and a tolerance of others' handicaps is a great blessing. Teach your child to have consideration for the feelings of others or she will not be loved or admired even if she leaves her mother behind in education. All mothers are proud of their children when they have ability or talent but it is a fatal mistake to allow any child to look down upon you or patronize a parent. Can you take a correspondence course or if you are near a night school you might go for a while if you can leave your family in the evening but if nothing else is available, have your child help you and let her understand that it is an honor to help you and don't let her think that the favor is all on her side. I hope you will see your way out.

COMFORT sisters, your letters, recipes and helpful suggestions have been a help to me at times.

Do you know when intending to bake potatoes, greasing them with lard after washing, will help keep them mealy and moist?

Mr. Gannett's travels are very interesting. I enjoy reading Cousin Marion's advice to girls, and sometimes I laugh too when she is just a little sarcastic. I read the Home Lawyer; in fact, the whole magazine is good.

If any of the sisters care to write to me I will be pleased to answer as many as I can.

MRS. A. V. FI DELL.

ROCKFORD, 2621 CANNON ST., ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber to this paper a few years and the sisters' letters appeal to me more than anything else, though every department is good.

I wonder if any of the sisters can suggest a cure for stammering. My little girl five years old has stammered for two years. I have tried to have her talk slowly but with no success. I have asked doctors but they say she will outgrow it. She is a nervous child. If anyone can help me I will be very grateful.

MRS. A. V. ANDERSON.

HELLO EVERYBODY: ALEXANDRIA, ALA.

I have said for a long time, "I'm going to write to the Sisters' Corner tomorrow," but like lots of other things, tomorrow never came.

We have been married two years; we lost a darling little girl ten months old, and miss her so much. We try not to grieve and to think of other things.

We have spent most of our married life in Auburn, Alabama. My husband was not through college when we were married. He was taking an agricultural course and we are back on the farm which we own in the rich land of Alexandria valley. It is considered very fertile but it has not been taken care of in a great many ways. We are trying to improve our place. Have set out three hundred fruit trees and are going to take care of them. We are living in an old house at present but are to move into our new one this spring. I have planned a flower garden on left of house and vegetable garden just below. Have set out pecans for shade trees.

I think a country woman should have conveniences to work with. The men buy everything they need for their work, why don't the women and not be like the joke about George Washington. George Washington and Martha came back to earth and George went to the barn to hitch up to plough. He came back and said, "Martha, everything down there is new. I don't know how to use any of the tools." She said, "George, everything in the kitchen is just like I left it."

We had furnished rooms in Auburn so, of course, had that dreaded expense of buying furniture. We bought all of it second hand. It had been used very badly but after we get it all varnished it will look like new. We want to buy nice furniture later on but can't afford to now.

Here is our house plan: living-room and kitchen on right, two bedrooms, bathroom and sleeping porch on left. Have two side entrances from porch. The rooms will have high ceilings.

My mother died when I was five years old, leaving two boys younger, and we were raised in a sort of tom-boy way. I had to do the housekeeping when I was thirteen. Father's health was not good but with it all I guess he had a good bit of patience with us kids.

We are going to raise thoroughbred chickens and turkeys.

I would appreciate letters, especially those telling how they beautify their home surroundings.

Love to all. MRS. H. H. SALYO.

NEBRASKA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

This is in answer to Uneducated Mother of Illinois.

As with you, it was impossible for me to attend school as I desired. I have wanted to be able to take my place in a small town social circle, and my place isn't an easy one for husband is Supt. of Schools and you know what that means. I have tried all kinds of ways to get an education which would enable me to be among educated people and be able to understand and speak on different subjects without attracting attention because of my ignorance.

Of course, as with most school men and preachers, we move every few years, so I remember my blunders and try not to repeat them. The main thing is to read good books, books that at first you may not enjoy, but you will learn to if you do not give up. The same holds true in music. Learn to like the good. This jazz is only for a little time and the good lasts forever. Read history, both ancient and modern. Myer's Ancient History, published by Ginn and Co., is very good. Early Progress, by West, published by Allyn and Bacon. Both companies are in Chicago. West lives tories, if you can get them, are written in such a way that you can't help but enjoy them. School books are getting better every year and it makes me wonder to see our school children do so little sometimes. Parents should do their best to keep their children in school. Get an arithmetic like your children's and keep ahead of them. If your husband can help them he can help you.

I imagine there are a good many of us who are trying to get an education after we are mothers. Make yourself take part in club, lodge and church work. It gets easier every time. Reading aloud will help. I take time to read and there is so much, anyone who really cares can learn. A good book is a tonic to me so it is no hardship. Above all, be your own true self. I enjoy our paper very much.

Sincerely, MRS. F.

SIOUX FALLS, 419 NO. WASHINGTON AVE., SO. DAK.
DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL:

So mny times I have thought of writing but was always afraid my letter would never be published. I am in need of a little comfort and will take a chance.

I often wonder if other American girls who marry foreigners have such a time as I have.

I have been married a little over two years to one of the best men alive. He is a true gentleman, through and through, he is a foreigner (from Argentine) and I gave up religion to marry him. My people have never had anything to do with him. They write to me but never mention his name. My father has never forgiven me. His people are Scotch and clannish. My husband has tried to make friends with father but it is no use.

My husband has decided to go back to his own country this spring. I don't know what to do, they are so different down there. I wonder if his people will treat me as my people have treated him. I cannot bear the thought of going but I can't blame him for wanting to go.

I have a baby girl seven months old. She is named after her Daddy, Manuela Josephine. She is a regular little Spanish girl, brown eyes, dark brown curly hair and is very pretty. Even my father will admit that.

We leave very soon. My mother sends me COMFORT with some other magazines so I will be able to enjoy COMFORT in that faraway land.

Best wishes to all.

MRS. MANUEL J. RODUQUEZ.

Mrs. Roduquez.—Won't you try and regard the coming of each number of COMFORT as a visit from friends who wish you well, for with the reading of your letter that is the way the sisters will feel toward you. I know them, from reading letters from hundreds of them, and they are kindly, friendly people. I'm thinking you won't regard Argentine as such a "faraway land," for it will be home to you, and you will be happy there because you take your happiness with you. Won't you write and tell us about it? We shall be looking for a letter from you.—Ed.

VERMONT.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

For a long time I have thought that I would write to the Sisters' Corner but did not because so many others would write more interestingly, but my help may be needed and here I am. Tall and stout, with big feet and hands but of some use in the world after all. I was a nurse before my marriage and let me advise you all if you want to be well, eat right. I know what I am talking about. Many of our bodily ailments are caused by over-indulgence in some particular food that does not agree with our systems. We do not need fresh meat in hot weather when we can have so much from the garden and fresh fruit is easily obtained. In the winter we need the heat that meat supplies to the body but we also need vegetables and fruits to offset the acid of the meat.

Now a word to Uneducated Mother. It seems to me one who uses as good English as you do could easily obtain books from your own public library or buy and study them or, possibly you could find a good correspondence course in just the branches you lack, but it looks to me as though you were losing the chance you need by not working with your children. Why not say to them, "Let's work this out together." Use your reason. Do not stop at following the rules and method of your book but reason out why you are doing so. Apply your faculties to a problem in arithmetic as you would to your work in your home. It is never too late to learn. I was years older than you when my chance to learn to be a nurse came to me.

Mary Jane, ask the Christian sisters to give you advice. My advice is that if you forgive the man you should forgive the girl as she cannot be all to blame. Take your troubles to Him who heareth and He will show you just what to do.

I am married to a very good man who is kind to me and we have a sweet little boy over a year old. I am a stepmother as well but the children are all away but come home for visits. They have always treated me well and I am fond of them but who says they are like our own?

With best wishes to all, VERMONT SISTER.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Do not use corn meal or tea leaves in sweeping carpets. The corn meal is known to attract water bugs, if not very thoroughly swept up, while the tea leaves, if not carefully washed, are liable to leave a stain. If anything is used, let it be small pieces of newspaper, dampened and thrown about the floor.

To prevent white fabrics, such as tulle, silk, and choice lace from becoming yellow when packed away, sprinkle bits of white wax freely among the folds.

The best duster is a damp cloth as this collects the dust and holds it. A feather duster is useless, it only moves the dust elsewhere.

Wash painted walls with ammonia water, using four tablespoons of ammonia water to six quarts of clear water. Rinse with clear water and rub as nearly dry as possible.

To drive away red ants, keep a small bag of sulphur in the drawers or closets and they will disappear.

To clean soiled wallpaper, take a half loaf of bread and gently rub the soiled portions with it, working always in a downward direction. As soon as the bread becomes soiled, cut off a thin slice.

FILING FOR CRACKS IN FLOORS.—A very good filling for cracks in floors may be made by soaking newspapers, which have been torn in small pieces, in a paste made of one pound of flour, three quarts of water and a tablespoon of alum, thoroughly boiled and mixed. Make the final mixture as thick as putty and it will harden like papier-mache.

STAIN FOR FLOORS.—The best, cheapest and only permanent stain for floors is permanganate of potash. You can get it at any drug store. Mix about one-quarter ounce to a quart of water. Apply freely and quickly to clean, dry floor, with a brush, being careful not to stain the hands. Repeat the process if a very dark color is desired. When dry, oil with burnt linseed oil or beeswax and turpentine. You cannot wash this color

New Way to Rid Poultry of Lice

Rev. G. R. Mente Tells of Amazing Discovery Which Keeps Hens and Chicks Free From Vermin

Few Drops of Liquid in Drinking Water Does It—No More Dusting, Spraying or Greasing

"I have used your remarkable Lice and Mite Remedy with fine results," writes Rev. G. R. Mente, Methodist Parsonage, New Washington, Ohio. "It proved all you claimed for it. Mentioned this at a Farmers' Institute a few weeks ago. Consequently, farmers by the dozen have been after me ever since to find out where and how they could get it. Rush me $5.00 worth to help out. Your remedy not only does away with Lice and Mites, but it is the only thing that has put a stop to the poultry losses in this community. You are a great benefactor to poultry raisers."

Easy and Simple to Use

This remarkable new discovery which Rev. G. R. Menter used is Imperial Lice and Mite Remedy. Just a few drops occasionally in the fowls' drinking water makes Lice, Mites, Ticks and all vermin go like magic. No more disagreeable and unsanitary dusting, spraying, greasing or dipping. Equally good for Chickens, Turkeys, Ducks, Geese and Pigeons. Fine for baby chicks and makes them healthier, sturdier and grow faster.

All poultry raisers know that sickly, lice-infested hens cannot lay or have good hatches. Vermin sap the very life and strength of hens and baby chicks. Stop these losses now. Guaranteed not to affect eggs or flesh of fowls in any way. Also a splendid egg tonic and blood purifier. Costs but a trifle, on money-back guarantee of satsifaction.

White Diarrhea Remedy Free
(Regular $1.00 Size Package)

At last a sure treatment for this dread disease. No muss. No fuss. Comes in condensed tablet form to be dropped occasionally in chicks' drinking water. Raise every chick hatched. Economical to use. Be prepared. These remedies should always be on hand.

SEND NO MONEY. Just your name and address to Imperial Laboratories, Dept. 6699, Kansas City, Mo., for one regular, full size $1.00 bottle of Imperial Lice and Mite Remedy (double strength), and they will include free of cost, a regular $1.00 box of Imperial White Diarrhoea Remedy. Pay postman only $1.00 and few cents postage on arrival.

If you have a large flock, this Special Introductory Offer also applies on a double quantity of both remedies—two regular $1.00 bottles of Lice and Mite Remedy, and two regular $1.00 packages of White Diarrhea Remedy at an additional saving—all for $1.75. If you prefer the larger quantity, simply specify that you be sent this regular $4.00 value for only $1.75. Readers risk no money, as Imperial Laboratories are fully responsible and will refund the cost on request any time within 30 days.

Keep Musterole on the bath-room shelf

Years ago the old-fashioned mustard plaster was the favorite remedy for rheumatism, lumbago, colds on the chest and sore throat.

It did the work all right, but it was sticky and messy to apply and my how it did burn and blister!

The little white jar of Musterole has taken the place of the stern old mustard plaster.

Keep this soothing ointment on your bathroom shelf and bring it out at the first cough or sniffle, at rheumatism's first warning tingle.

Made from pure oil of mustard, with the blister and sting taken out, Musterole penetrates the skin and goes right down to the seat of the trouble.

Order Musterole today from your druggist. He has it in 35c and 65c jars and tubes; hospital size, $3.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. J. L., Illinois.—If the man you mention made untrue statements in order to reduce the extent of your title to real estate vested in you with malicious intent, we think you are entitled to collect from him such damages as you have suffered by reason thereof in the proper action brought for the purpose.

H. E., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your brothers and sisters and such other persons as may have an interest in your mother's estate are willing to make a voluntary sale of their interest in her real estate to you their deeds of the same would convey good title to you subject to the debts and expenses of administration and subject to such inheritance taxes and other taxes as may be due from your mother's estate.

R. L., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention was deeded to the husband and wife in such manner as to create a tenancy by the entirety the whole property upon the death of one became the sole property of the survivor and could be disposed of by such survivor as he or she may see fit, provided such survivor did not remarry and provided such survivor possessed proper mental capacity and was not at the time of disposing of the property under the undue influence of some other person. We think in your state action for the recovery of real estate must in all ordinary cases be brought within twenty-one years, except in cases of persons under legal disability, but that all such are barred after thirty years.

M. A. McD., Missouri.—We think it will be necessary for you to have an examination made of the deed you mention in order to determine the rights of the persons named as grantees thereunder.

Mrs. C. M., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your mother-in-law's will was not contested or set aside your husband would have no interest in her estate except such as was provided for him by the terms of the will.

D. S. D., Massachusetts.—If you desire to keep trespassers from your land, we think you should advertise and post notices forbidding them from trespassing thereon.

J. B., Indiana.—We do not think the maker of the note you mention could avail himself of the defense you mention if the note was a negotiable one and was transferred before maturity to a third party who purchased same for a valuable consideration without notice and without knowledge that there was a defense to the payment of the same. (2) We think that the interest of a minor in real estate could be disposed of in the proper court action or proceeding brought for the purpose.

H. B., West Virginia.—We think the settlement of your line fence dispute all depends upon an accurate survey of the property, the disputed strip of land belonging to the owner who can establish the oldest and best title to the property.

E. N. L., Kansas.—Under the laws of Minnesota, we are of the opinion that an administrator can be compelled to render an account of his proceedings after the expiration of eighteen months after his appointment in the first instance and at such other intervals thereafter as the court may direct.

Mrs. N. E. H., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that as between the parties, and such as have actual knowledge thereof conveyances are valid without being recorded, but as a general rule we think deeds should be recorded promptly.

B. M. B., Wyoming.—We are unable to form an opinion as to your rights under the contract you signed for the purchase of an automobile, but we think it quite probable that you forfeited the deposit you paid upon your cancellation of your agreement.

W. M. B., Louisiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children may be disinherited by will for certain causes as set forth in the Civil Code, but in the absence of such causes a testator has no right to disinherit his children; we think if you desire to execute a will you should employ a lawyer to attend to the matter for you; we think the fees to which a lawyer would be entitled for such a service would depend upon the nature of the will, and be subject to such agreement as you may make with such lawyer regarding his charge.

M. A. L. North Carolina.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion that if you owe the money upon the note you gave and if the statute of limitations have not been against the enforcement of the payment of the same, the receiver of the bank which failed could enforce the payment of same if such bank is the legal owner and holder thereof.

W. H. D., Virginia.—We think it would be wiser and better for you to employ some local attorney to prepare your will for you, as the law relating to wills is very technical, and any chance of a mistake should be avoided.

Mrs. W. R., New Jersey.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of your husband, without a will it would be necessary to have an administrator appointed of the estate in order to convey good title to her personal property.

Mrs. A. L. T., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and having a surviving widow and brother and sisters as his heirs at law and next of kin, his widow would receive one-half of the real estate and the whole of the personal estate after the payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the real estate going to the brothers and sisters and the descendants of any deceased brother or sister.

Mrs. A. D., Connecticut.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a will of a husband or wife can only dispose of his or her property subject to the rights of the survivor, but that children may be disinherited by will provided the testator possesses testamentary capacity and is not, at the time the will was executed, under undue influence of any other person; If in the case you submit the husband and wife were separated under a written agreement at the time of the wife's death, we think the husband's rights in her estate would depend upon the separation agreement, if such agreement was not in conflict with the law.

J. H., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children may be disinherited by will provided the testator possesses testamentary capacity and is not under undue influence of any other person at the time the will is executed. We think the statute of limitations runs against actions for the recovery of real estate within twenty years in the state of Indiana.

Mrs. M. A. H., South Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the man you mention possessed testamentary capacity and if no undue influence was exercised upon him, he could legally leave all his property to his stepson to the exclusion of his sister.

Mrs. M. S., Utah.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations would run against an action on a promissory note within six years from the time of the last payment on account made thereon; we think, however, that in order to hold an endorser the note must be protested at maturity. We think action can be brought as soon as the note becomes due, or as soon as there is any default in the payment of interest thereon.

Miss M. L. H., Kentucky.—We think that the marriage of an uncle to his niece is prohibited by the laws of all the states of the United States.

it. It should be changed daily and the vessel kept perfectly clean. Experiments conducted at the Connecticut Experiment Station have proven its great value. Experiments conducted at the New Jersey Station show that where sour milk is used as mentioned, the percentage of mortality was very materially reduced, over pens that did not receive it. Also the skim-milk chicks made a gain of over 28 per cent. more than those receiving no milk. Since these conclusive tests it is needless to say that we are feeding skim milk (sour) to all of our young chicks during the brooding period with the greatest success.

Wheat bran is a valuable adjunct to the chick ration. It is especially palatable and rich in protein. It has a high ash content (phosphoric acid) and is fairly bulky, which makes it useful to mix with finer and more concentrated foods. Wheat bran aids the digestion through the presence of a ferment "diastase" which it contains, and is mildly laxative.

The chick during its early growth makes bone rapidly; for this reason plenty of ash must be supplied.

Extensive experiments show the great value of bone in ration. Dry granulated bone contains about twenty-five per cent. of phosphoric acid and about the same amount of protein, and can be secured by the hundred pounds for a little over two dollars.

The same series of experiments showed conclusively the great need of animal material in the ration for growing chicks. Flocks fed moderate quantities of meat scraps made by far the greatest and fastest gains, and were much healthier than flocks from which all animal material was withheld. The food nutrients from animal sources seem in practice to be more readily available than the same nutrients from vegetable sources. Large quantities of meat or concentrated animal protein feeds should not be fed, especially early in the breeding period, as the forcing which results is apt to cause a relatively high mortality.

Plenty of green feed in the form of lettuce leaves, sprouted oat tops, green clover or alfalfa must be supplied. Such material is termed succulence, carrying, as it does, a high water content. It adds to the palatability of the ration, making it more digestible and keeping the chicks hungry and healthy.

There are several makes of fireless brooders on the market which range in price from $2.50 to $5.00, but you can make quite a practical one for fifty cents when empty cases may be had from the grocery store, or a dollar if lumber has to be bought.

The first requisite is a box two feet square and seven inches deep, with a lid at least five inches deep. Or, if you can get two strong boxes the same size, which are six or seven inches deep, take off the lids and use one of the bottoms for a lid. Put two hinges on the back, and a hook and eye at the front. Cut a hole three inches square in the center of the front for the chickens to run in and out of. At both ends of the lid or top box, make half-inch holes three inches apart, and one inch from the top. Then make a frame to fit inside of the box and rest on the cleats; cover it with burlap, and then cut a long strip of felt, flannel, old blanket or any soft woolen matelal. It does not matter so much what it is so long as it is warm and woolly. It should be about four inches wide. Make cuts one inch apart the entire length, leaving about half an inch as a heading. Then stitch the fringed material to the burlap, commencing in the center of the frame and going round and round, the rows to be about an inch apart. At first, put the frame on to the cleats in the lower part of the brooder, with the fringed material hanging down, to make a comfortable covering for the chicks. After the babies are about two weeks old, the frame must be put on to the frame in the top part of the box, which will lift the ends of the material about three inches from the floor of the brooder.

At first, when the screen is in the lower part of the brooder, fold a piece of cotton batting and fit carefully over it, filling in the entire space to the edge of the box. In the top half, put a layer of excelsior about an inch and a half deep, then fill in with cotton batting to the edge. The burlap on the frame being porous, and the cotton batting ditto, allows a perfect system of ventilation from the front opening to the holes in the top part of the brooder. Of course, when the frame is moved to the top part of the brooder, some of the cotton batting has to be removed, but by that time the chicks have grown considerably, and furnish a great deal more animal heat than they did at first.

After the babies are about four weeks old, it is well to take out the frame with the fringed woolen material attached, and use another frame covered with burlap, which is to keep the cotton batting in place.

Before using the brooder, give it a coat of whitewash and cover the floor with sweepings from the haymow, or finely cut hay, to make a carpet for the chicks to stand on. Or course, such brooders should be housed in a light, dry place. A good coop can be made out of a piano box or a large dry goods box. A piano box can usually be got for about two dollars from any store that sells pianos, and will, with the addition of a couple of small windows and paint or roofing paper, make it waterproof. It makes a good house in which to keep two or three small brooders, or the same number of portable lamp heated hovers.

I. E.—Your mistake has been in changing your gander each year. Geese are faithful creatures, and once mated, families should not be disturbed, and if any accident makes it necessary to introduce a new gander, he should be introduced early in the fall, so that there is plenty of time for him to be acknowledged as head of the family before the mating season.

J. R. D.—There is no difference in the general characteristics of Barred and White Plymouth Rocks. Orpingtons are very much like Plymouth Rocks, good general purpose birds. Minorcas are about a pound lighter than Rocks, but are extremely good layers of large white eggs. For practical purposes there is no difference between the Rose and Single Comb Rhode Island Reds. Of course, Rose Combs are better for extremely cold climates, and are not liable to freeze. If you live in a part of the country where there is no fear of severe winters, that would have no value for you. I think you would find Minorcas, Leghorns and Anconas profitable, if you are going in specially for table eggs, and can give them free range.

G. S.—This is a very severe outbreak of malignant roup. Separate all the afflicted birds from the rest of the flock, and keep them in strict quarantine while treating. Get twenty-five cents' worth of permanganate of potassium from the drug store, dissolve one teaspoonful in a quart of warm water. Stir until thoroughly melted, then bottle for use. Dilute one tablespoonful of the mixture with three of water. Fill a small syringe and spray the birds' eyes, nostrils and throat three times a day. Give the birds light nourishing food, such as stale bread soaked in milk and squeezed dry, or rice which has been boiled in milk. Chop a few green onion tops, dandelion leaves or clover, and give them all they will eat each day. To safeguard the remainder of the flock, the chicken-house, water and feed dishes and all fixtures should be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected. No matter how thoroughly some of the birds may seem to mend, don't be tempted to use any of their eggs for setting, as chicks hatched from such eggs are sure to be weak and susceptible to disease, even if they live.

No remedy can cure all ailments of the human body, but an immense number of people suffer from aches, pains and diseasesymptoms when their real trouble is lack of iron in the blood. It is the iron in your blood that enables you to get the nourishment out of your food. Without iron your food merely passes through you without doing you any good; you don't get the strength out of it. There is one universally known tonic that has helped thousands because it contains iron like the iron in fresh vegetables and like the iron in your blood.

How lovely she had looked, with not a jewel to deck her, excepting that rich coral clasp at the throat.

Her every look, tone and movement had endeared the true lady, both then and ever since he had met her at the opera.

That evening, as he sat in his own room, his valet brought him a note.

It was signed by Wilbur Coolidge, and told him that he would find Miss Douglas at the "Washington."

As early the following morning as it would do, Adrian Dredmond presented himself at the "Washington" and inquired for Miss Douglas.

The clerk turned to his book and looked over the names of the new arrivals.

Hers was not there!

Mr. Dredmond was in despair.

"Are you sure?" he asked anxiously.

For reply the clerk placed the book before him and pointed with his finger to the list of arrivals for the last two days.

It was even as he had said; her name was not there!

For two days after he returned to the "Washington," making the same inquiries and receiving the same answer.

No, Brownie Douglas had not been there, and she never came.

He sought her at every respectable hotel in London, but not a trace of her could he find.

He haunted the streets where genteel lodgings were advertised, but without success.

On the Sabbath he walked the streets, peering into every young face that he met, but those clear brown eyes never greeted him in his weary search, and that lovely face was but a vision in his memory.

Monday he went to Wilbur and told him of Miss Douglas's strange disappearance, and his fruitless search for her; and the young man was nearly distracted himself.

"They have driven her to her death, curse them!" he muttered fiercely, and he told Adrian the story of the jewels.

His father had returned unexpectedly, and he acquainted him also with the facts of the case.

A scene ensued which was long remembered by both Isabel and her mother, while Mr. Coolidge spared no trouble or expense to find the unfortunate girl.

Wilbur had been so bound up in his own sorrow that he had paid no attention to the number of the cab in which Brownie had gone away, neither had he noticed the driver; so that although he sought out and questioned every cabby that he could find, he could gain no clue to the missing girl.

Mr. Coolidge advertised and engaged a detective to look her up, while Adrian Dredmond and Wilbur haunted the streets day and night, but all to no purpose.

Beautiful Brownie Douglas—abused, insulted, friendless—seemed to have dropped out of existence as completely as a star when it falls from its place in the heavens!

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

TREMBLING HEART, Mississippi.—Your involuntary trembling when you meet this attractive young man certainly indicates that you love him quite as much as you say you do, and that he means so much to you that his presence always affects your heart's barometer. This nervousness will wear off, we think, when you have been with him more, or when you become certain that your affection is returned in kind and your relationship becomes more equalized. Now we believe he means more to you than you do to him. Try and not idealize or idolize him too much and it will help you when in his presence, although this is perhaps advice that it will be useless for us to give you at this time, and of a sort it will be impossible for you to put into effect. Including law, lessons and locksmiths, young love laughs at many things—and this includes advice of elders. But we feel that we must warn you that your sensitiveness should make you overcareful when, whom and how you love, if you do not wish to have affection's sweet experiences bring you more pain than happiness.

A. M. S., Wisconsin.—It was perfectly correct for you to eat this ice or any like frozen dessert with a spoon.

VIOLET, Chapel Hill, Tex.—It would be permissible for you to write this boy a note thanking him for his card and verses, although if you are seeing him often, verbal thanks would be quite sufficient. (2) When you enter your house with this boy who has escorted you home, you may lead the way and you should not wait for him to enter first.

I. N., Elkins, N. M.—At your simple home table, your guest's knife should be placed at the right of the plate, and the fork or forks at the left. Any spoons should be placed at the right of the knife. (2) The escort of two girls would not walk between them, but would take his place at the side of the street nearest the curb. In a like case on a country road, the man would walk on the inside (that is, nearest the roadway)—thus to be on the guard against traffic accident or soil from passing vehicles.

FOUR BLUE EYES, Arkansas.—A boy would not leave a girl during the service, after escorting her to church, unless he had the best of excuses and was able to make proper apologies. (2) A boy who accepts a girl's invitation to enter the house, after escorting her home from church or other evening affair, should not make his stay a long one. A half hour would seem reasonable. (3) Certainly a girl is entitled to time to consider a proposal of marriage, and a suitor is unjustified in demanding an immediate and definite reply to so important a question. Yes or no are little words quickly said, but marriage is a big thing and of long duration. (4) A boy who tries to put his arm about a girl without her consent should be plainly told that he cannot make himself liked by doing things he has been politely asked not to do. A boy who is unmannerly enough to assume liberties, should be mannerly snubbed until he has been taught better. Some colts need more breaking-in than others.

O. B., Hollis, Okla.—It seems to us that when a girl takes a bow out of a boy's hat she is spoiling a perfectly good article of headgear—and that's all it would seem to mean to us. Has Oklahoma any different rules? (2) It is not good manners to put one's fingers about the mouth, to bite one's nails, etc.

WORRIED, Texas.—Your being a fourth or fifth cousin to this boy we do not think should be sufficient blood relationship to serve as an obstacle to marriage. (2) Your fiance may have given a ring to this girl and he may have made other gifts to various girls before he asked you to marry him. We don't think you should ask that he retrieve these gifts. Suppose he asked the girl to give him back this ring and she refused? And how much better would it make him love you or you love him if he got this ring back? Don't take your friends' advice about your love affair. Use your own judgment and your knowledge of the man you love.

TROUBLED, Missouri.—Your letter gives us the suspicion that perhaps this girl and her mother wish you to declare how serious your attentions really are and if you wish to marry the girl. Have you thought of this? Our advice is that if you really love the girl and are in a position to ask her to marry you, no grass or new suitors should be allowed to grow under your feet or in this girl's parlor. Try out our advice and see if we are not right. The ways of a maid with a man are often just as strange as when it is the other way around.

BROWN EYES, Nashville, Tenn.—Remember that you have not met this young man, so your reply to his first letter must be brief. However, you need not frighten or hurt him by too much formality. Thank him for his pleasant letter. Say your cousin has often spoken to you about him, and that you hope that when he is next in town he may be able to carry out his wish of having your cousin bring him to call at your home. Sign yourself "sincerely," and make sure by a last reading that your note is frankly pleasant and cordial and not too stiff. If the boy is so genuinely anxious to meet you, he should have the opportunity. (2) That you feel no uneasiness when you see this boy paying attention to other girls does not make us think you care very deeply for him. It is our personal opinion that a certain amount of jealousy and desire for possession goes with all true love. Nevertheless the affection you feel might be sufficient upon which to base a happy marriage. But it will be time enough to commence to think about this seriously when the boy asks you to marry him, won't it?

MRS. L. W. J., California.—It helps subsequent conversation, we think, to keep introductions as brief and informal as possible. You might say: "Miss Blank, do you know my friend, Mr. Dash?" Or: "Miss Dash, Mr. Blank has been so much wanting to know you." Although you are putting a little conversational burden on the man by this last form. The secret of what you term "clever" or "popular" introductions is not in the words used, which must necessarily be fairly brief and formal, but in a sentence or two the introducer may use, which indicates a pathway of conversation that can be easily followed by those meeting for the first time. A little thought will enable you to put in a phrase that will help to launch your introduction smoothly and smilingly on the social waters.

P. H., Elizabethtown, N. C.—You should be patient under your brother's kind and doubtless wise chaperonage. Not many brothers of twenty-two are so willing to serve as a "kid sister's" escort. We think that if your brother thought it best for you to make dates with these boys who write you letters, he would be the first to permit this liberty which you think would make you happier. Accept his advice and guidance for a while. You are decidedly young yet, although you may not think so. And remember that your big brother knows quite a lot about boys and girls and acts according to his experience.

M. J., Gaffney, S. C.—Yes; you should thank your escort who has taken you to any sort of entertainment. This is most suitably done as you are saying "good night" after he has brought you home. No stiff or set phrases are needed, and you might say: "Thank you very much. I have had a delightful time." And throw in a smile or two for good measure.

Three Wheel Chairs in March

679 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The recipients of the three March wheel chairs are: Dan Barders, Campbell, Mo., 72; Ira B. Norton, R. 3, Box 120, Durant, Okla., 65; Hazel Anna Johnson, Bonesteel, So. Dak., 64. The figures following their respective addresses indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by these applicants or by their friends for them.

Dan Barders, age 54, was stricken with paralysis last August, which has deprived him of the use of his lower limbs, but as he can sit up and use his hands, he will be able to get about in his wheel chair. It will be a merciful relief of his crippled condition.

Ira B. Norton, age 30, single, is so crippled by rheumatism in his legs that for the past ten years he has not been able to walk, and he also suffers from lameness and stiffening of his back, but can use his hands. He has long been in need of this wheel chair.

Hazel Anna Johnson, age 14, is in a pitiable condition as described by her mother, who writes: "My little daughter is a helpless cripple, never has stood on her feet, has no use of her hands, and cannot sit up unless supported by pillows. But she likes to be in the same room with me, and also enjoys being out of doors, and I thought a wheel chair would make it easier for me to get her about. I have an old arm-chair fixed for her, but it is very heavy for me to lift about, and she is not easy to handle, for when one lifts her she is so limp she cannot even hold her head up."

We ought to be sending out more wheel chairs, especially at this season. Give the good work a boost this month and help me to provide the means of getting a goodly number of crippled shut-ins out into the May sunshine.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT,
Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little easier each month than you do yours.

Comfort Wheel Chair a Great Help.

Greenwood, Ark.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I am sending you a picture of myself taken in my wheel chair, which I would like to see in COMFORT. My chair is a great help to me and to those who take care of me. I wish to thank you and each kind friend that helped me to get it.

Sincerely yours,
Elva Tedford.

How Pleased He Looks in His Wheel Chair

Gunnison, Utah.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I am sending a photo of Raymond D. Ludington in his wheel chair, to be printed in COMFORT so that everybody may see how pleased he looks with it. We wish to thank you and all our friends who helped to obtain it for him. It certainly is a big help to Raymond and also to me. Again thanking you all for your kind assistance, we remain

RAYMOND D. LUDINGTON HAPPY IN HIS WHEEL CHAIR.

Respectfully,
Raymond D. Ludington and Mother.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

R. H., Phenix, Va.—To become a home demonstrator or house-to-house agent for any household-used article would not mean that you need to take any general "course" of training. What you require to fit you for such work is a fluency of speech, an engaging personality, some natural qualities as a salesman, and a thorough knowledge of the product which you are demonstrating. Also you will need a persistency in the face of discouragement and a faith that day by day you are going to make larger and larger sales. All these things and qualities cannot be given you by any course, yet without them you could not make a success of any agency work.

Mrs. C. R., Kentucky.—There are no vacant public lands in the state of Ohio.

G. B. H., Muskogee, Okla.—You should address the Commissioner of Patents, U. S. Patent Office, Washington, D. C., for forms and information concerning an application for patent. The U. S. Patent Office maintains no "government patent advisor," but does suggest as follows: "It is advisable in every case, however, that the services of a competent registered patent attorney be secured, as the value of patents depends largely upon the skillful preparation of the specification and claims. The Patent Office cannot recommend any particular attorney or firm, but advises applicants to avoid doing business with those who advertise the possession of unusual facilities for obtaining patents."

W. S., White Pine, Tenn.—You should have an education equivalent at least to a completed high school course before you could successfully hope to study to become a veterinary surgeon. Your letter indicates that you need some of this preliminary study. Secure this first.

Mrs. M. T., Liberty, Tenn.—A married woman or a widow is known by her husband's and not by her own given name. That is in the case you mention, the name would be "Mrs. John Jones," not "Mrs. Nancy Jones." In signing any legal papers or in any business transactions, however, the name would be written "Nancy Jones." To her friends and in her social correspondence, such a woman would sign her name, too, as plain "Nancy Jones." In writing to strangers or in business correspondence, the signature would properly appear: "(Mrs. John) Nancy Jones."

Mrs. G. O. C., Quincy, Fla.—In the case of any living poet whose work is being published in copyrighted form, it would be well for you to obtain permission before including any such verses in the collection you are planning to publish, and in all cases, of either dead or living authors, proper credit should be given by the inclusion of the poet's name at the end of his work. You should secure estimates from various printing houses concerning the cost of publishing such a book.

C. G., Elbridge, N. Y.—The ordinary small "oyster pearls" found in the popular bivalves are of small or no value. Show your find to any jeweler.

Miss P. D., Marbury, Md.—Following the plan of the illustrious hero whose eyes were scratched out by the briar bush and who restored his missing optics by "jumping in again," we are going to suggest that if your raincoat is "stuck together" by being hung in too warm a place, you may be able to "unstick" it by allowing it to remain again in a like warm location and then attempting its separation and ungumming while it is still warm and pliable.

Miss E. M., Pennsylvania.—There are 15,353,437 acres of surveyed vacant public lands in the big state of Wyoming. The greater part of these empty acres are in the eastern portion of the state. Cattle raising is yet Wyoming's chief industry, although with the spread of irrigation, agriculture is creeping gradually over the ranges. There are millions of acres in the state that await the touch of water to spring into productiveness. The last few years have seen great progress in private and public irrigation projects, and splendid crops have been produced in the irrigated sections. The state has also great mineral resources. Wyoming's U. S. Land Offices are located in the towns and cities of Cheyenne, Buffalo, Douglas, Evanston, Lander and Newcastle. You can write to any or all of these for further information. (2) Colorado offers 6,426,720 acres of land to prospective settlers. The bulk of this is in the central and eastern parts of the state. Like Wyoming, the agricultural possibilities of Colorado are blossoming through irrigation. The state stands second only to California in the number of farms now irrigated. Oats are a big crop in the state and a Grand county man has a record of 426 bushels produced on three acres. We think this would make Wayne county farmers in your state of Pennsylvania open their eyes! Mining is one of Colorado's great industries and no less than thirty-three minerals are produced in commercial supply. The U. S. Land Offices in the state are situated at Denver, Del Norte, Durango, Glenwood Springs, Hugo, Lamar, Leadville, Montrose, Pueblo and Sterling.

Beautify Your Home With These Magnificent Ever-Blooming Roses!

THERE'S no place like home—and no home as beautiful in summer as when surrounded with fragrant, luxuriously blooming roses. Why not plant some around your home this spring? Even if you now have a garden, you can find room for the five splendid bushes offered here—and they will cost you nothing. We buy these roses from the largest rose growers in the world. They are the finest that can be obtained. There are five different varieties in the assortment and each is absolutely the prize of its class, producing every month in the season an amazing profusion of large, magnificent blossoms, delightful in fragrance and of the most radiant colors. The bushes are one year old, strong, healthy, with well-formed roots. No matter where you live you will receive them at the proper time to plant in your locality. We guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. If they do not, or if any of the bushes fail to grow, we will replace them free of all cost. Following is a brief description of each of the five varieties given you on this offer. And please remember that with the bushes we are also going to send you complete directions for their planting and culture.

You Get One Each Of These Five Prize Beauties!

Mrs. Charles Bell One of the most beautiful and fragrant shell-pink roses ever introduced. It is a strong, vigorous grower and one of the hardiest of all bloomers. The flowers are faultlessly formed, extra large and double, and the abundance of bloom produced in one season is simply astounding.

Etoile De Lyon This magnificent bright sulphur-yellow rose is a fine forcer and an ideal variety both for cutting and garden purposes, being an exceptionally vigorous grower and prolific bloomer, bearing its flowers on strong, erect stems well covered with dark, glossy foliage.

W. C. Gaunt A rose of unusual individuality. Its color is a brilliant, velvety vermillion tipped with scarlet. The buds are medium long and pointed, the stems rigid, habit branching, with large, oval beech-green foliage. The fragrance of this rose is like tea and it is a rapid, vigorous grower.

Climbing Helen Gould There is probably no red rose so popular as the beautiful Helen Gould. It is now introduced for the first time in climbing form. Everybody is familiar with the warm watermelon-red color of its charming flowers. This is a grand climber, having none of the defects of the older varieties.

Snowflake A crowning masterpiece, with hardy, vigorous constitution, growing to perfection in almost any soil or situation. It has the most magnificent foliage and is a continuous bloomer of medium-size flowers, the beauty of which is nothing short of superb. Its color is pure white.

Our Free Offer For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you the above described five rose bushes (one each of the five varieties) free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8661. They will be mailed to you at the proper time for planting in your locality.

Handsome Stamped Pillow-Top

A DESIGN that will appeal to all lovers of home. A comfortable, old-fashioned farmhouse, the well with the "old oaken bucket," and a cluster of handsome American Beauty roses. The stamping is done in natural colors on tan art crash, 17x21 inches, these colors acting as a guide to the embroiderer. Or, if desired, the whole design may be simply outlined in black. If embroidered, the roses should be worked in red and pink, using the outline stitch for all but the light part, which should be worked solid. The leaves are to be outlined in green, the stems in brown. Work the house, well and surroundings in outline in colors corresponding to those stamped. The words "Home Sweet Home" are to be done in black in solid embroidery and outline stitch. We will send you this handsome stamped pillow-top with back and fringe upon the terms of the following offer:

Send Only Three Subscriptions For This Cut Glass Sugar and Creamer—Or Two Subscriptions For The Pickle Dish Or Spoon Tray!

WE want to ask our women readers—did you ever see or hear of a more remarkable offer?

Just think of the small number of subscriptions required to earn any one or all of these beautiful cut glass pieces.

And it is real cut glass—of good weight and thickness—clear, brilliant, crystal glass, exquisitely hand cut in a new and beautiful design. Each piece is full size with the same handsome floral pattern that twines completely around the outside in graceful curves, while on the bottom of each piece is a heavily cut, many-pointed star. The rim of both sugar and creamer is deeply notched.

Do you wonder how we can make this offer? A certain factory, realizing that we shall probably use thousands of these sets, has made us an unusually low price. That's the whole story. And the result is we can give you your choice of this rich genuine cut glass absolutely free in return for the easiest half hour's work you ever did.

We Prepay Charges And Positively Guarantee Safe Delivery

Any or all of these pieces can be safely mailed by parcel post. We pay all postage and guarantee safe delivery to your home. If by chance a piece should become broken (something that rarely happens) we will replace it free of charge.

We know that every woman that receives one or more of these rich cut glass pieces will be amazed and delighted with the bargain she has obtained. It is easily the greatest value in a premium that we have ever been able to offer. We will give you your choice of the Sugar and Creamer, or the Pickle Dish, or the Spoon Tray absolutely free on the terms of the following special Club Offers. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT and Creamer by prepaid insured parcel post. (Reward No. 8883). Or for two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you your choice of either the Pickle Dish (Reward No. 9402), or the Spoon Tray (Reward No. 9412). Or we will send you the complete set of all four pieces free and prepaid for a club of seven one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each. (Reward No. 7457).

Every Chapter Crammed Full of WHITE-HOT THRILLS!

Every Book a "Humdinger"

12 Full Length Novels $1.98 For All

Just Think of It!

A dozen books for the price of one—and every yarn an "ace."

Exciting? You'll say so! 12 red-blooded tales. Real thrills on every page. You whirl along breathlessly from climax to climax. Smashing, unexpected endings make you gasp. Never a slow evening if you own these books. Just like being a cowboy, a prospector, a dare-devil adventurer yourself. Every story a "ripsnorter."

Live the life of the big open Western world—among hairy-chested, hard-fighting frontiersmen who tramp, ride, camp, scheme, love and hate—yes, and sometimes shoot to kill! Live among them in Adventure-land! These fascinating, gripping stories will pick you up and whirl you bodily into the "gun-toting" life of the West—the bad old, glad old West. Every one of these books will make you "hold on to your chair."

See All You Get: 12 Bully Books, Sizzling with Excitement!

Don Quickshot of the Rio Grande — Stephen Chalmers
"Looking f'r Trouble is my middle name," said Impulsive Pep, adventuring cowpuncher. And there on the border, among raiding Mexican bandits, train robbers, Texas rangers, a prairie fire—not to mention a pair of blue eyes—he did not have far to look.

Spawn of the Desert — W. C. Tuttle
A tale of Calico Town: Where men lived raw in the desert's maw, and Hell was nothing to shun; where they buried 'em neat, without preacher or sheet and writ on their tombstone, crude but sweet, "This jasper was slow with his gun."

The Lure of Piper's Glen — Theodore Goodridge Roberts
It was the lure of all the great timber country of the North, of plentiful game, of the clear wind from the great plains. The call came South; young Jim Todhunter heard it, and a great tide of life in the North caught him up—to bring adventure a-plenty.

Apache Valley — Arthur Chapman
A story of a cattle war in the southwest, with all it means—terror and blood feud; alarms by night and day; rustling and stealthy murder. And through it all are woven the lives of true men as well as thieves, men whose lives reflected the glories of the land they protected.

The Challenge of the North — James B. Hendryx
This is a story of the call of the great Northland; of purposes and cross purposes, of true men and of "bad" men; and of big deals and pioneering triumphs. A tale of the North which holds for the young, the strong and the brave adventures that are countless.

The Second Mate — H. Bedford-Jones
Peril and mutiny on the China Seas. When every scupper was running red, and with two white women at the mercy of a villainous crew composed of the sweepings of the outermost islands. Jim Barnes realized the gage of desperate battle he had accepted when he signed on as second mate of the Sulu Queen.

The Devil's Payday — W. C. Tuttle
A sky of brass, the sun a flame, A hunk of earth so doggone hot
And the land no place to dwell; That it still belongs to Hell.

The Canyon of the Green Death — F. R. Buckley
Who were the devils in human form whose haunt was the lost barranca? Invisible, terrible; they brought the redoubtable young officer of the law to a strange dilemma. The law of the land commanded him not to desert his prisoners; the law of the desert ordained that he stand by his companions. Which did the Fates decree he should obey?

Sky-High Corral — Ralph Cummins
A yarn of unending feud between cattlemen and forest rangers; of forest fires, grazing herds and bitter fights at timberline. Yet in the end our gallant young ranger, through ordeal of battles, fire and blood, brought the old timers to see that the new ways of forest conservation are best.

Loaded Dice — Edward L. Sabin
A romance of Texas of the early days, when lives depended on the quickness of draw, and all the courage of the pioneers was needed to brave the perils they so fearlessly faced. A thrilling tale of men who were jugglers with death.

Sontag of Sundown — W. C. Tuttle
The story of the question of ownership of the T J ranch—a question which promoted bloodshed and a war of no mean caliber. The cowpunchers of this story will live long in your memory for their originality and enterprise. They are men whose best friends were their nerve and their gun.

Arizona Argonauts — H. Bedford-Jones
Three adventurers whose fortunes in the Arizona desert lead through drought and danger to the goal they sought, gold, free gold, the gold of which they had always dreamed. They were men quick on the trigger, who loved to face odds.

Three Sauce Pans of Pure Aluminum

Reward No. 9133

For Only Three Subscriptions

COMFORT'S host of housewives and cooks who like the clean, silver-bright appearance of aluminum will delight in preparing their meals with this handsome 3-piece set of pure aluminum sauce or cooking pans.

No housewife ever seems to have too many sauce pans around the kitchen and with such useful sizes as these—1½, 2 and 3 quart—she will hardly get a meal in which she does not use one or more of them.

Everyone knows how light in weight pure aluminum is but how obstinately it resists wear. The aluminum in this three-piece Set which we illustrate weighs less than a pound but it is heavy enough and thick enough to give years of steady service. They are seamless, sanitary, and easy to keep clean, and will not crackle, chip, or peel.

You will like the handles too. Notice how convenient they are and how firmly they are riveted to the pan.

It will take you but a few minutes to get this reward. You will enjoy using it for years. The following special offer makes it easy for you.

Given To You! For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you free by parcel post prepaid, three Aluminum Sauce Pans. Reward No. 9133.

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled Rings by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

What A Joyful Surprise For Some Little Girl In Your Home!

Won't She Fairly Dance With Glee When You Give Her This Big, Beautiful Sleeping Doll And Carriage—All For Her Very Own!

OF course she will—no girl could help being delighted with this big, beautiful dolly which is even more beautiful and lifelike than she appears in the illustration. She is sixteen inches tall and jointed in such a manner that her arms, hands, legs and feet will stay in any position you place them. Her dark brown hair falls in bewitching curls, she has real teeth, her eyes are as blue as the sky and she opens and shuts them and goes to sleep like a real baby whenever you want her to. And she is always smiling and showing her pretty white teeth in a truly lifelike manner.

As shown in our illustration, she wears a very becoming hat trimmed with a large ribbon bow and a dress of the very latest style, with cute short sleeves, handsome figured lace and button trimmed waist and short skirt and she has on real stockings and slippers with silveroid buckles. You can undress and dress this doll as often as you please and you can take off her stockings and slippers and put them on again just as you do your own.

Her Arms Hands Legs And Feet Will Stay In Any Position You Place Them

You Can Take Dolly To Ride In Her Carriage

YES, we are also going to give you this fine doll carriage which is plenty large enough to hold dolly comfortably. It is two feet high, almost a foot wide, made entirely of metal and leatherette—in fact is just like a real baby carriage in everything except size. It is finely finished and lacquered a rich glossy black. What fun it will be to take dolly to ride in her carriage out in the yard and up and down the street. Other girls may have dolls—but how many of them have a real doll carriage? You will be the envy of all the other girls in your neighborhood when they see you with this beautiful doll and carriage too.

Doll and Carriage 8 Subscriptions. Doll only for 6 subscriptions.

For A Club Of Eight!

FATHERS and mothers—don't you think your little girl would just love to have this doll and carriage for her very own? Of course she would—and you should take advantage of this offer at once.

You can surely find eight neighbors who will be glad to subscribe to COMFORT at the present low rate of 50c a year. Send us their names and addresses and the money ($4.00 in all), and we will send you this beautiful sleeping doll and doll carriage exactly as above described, each packed in strong box, free by parcel post. Please mention Reward No. 7648 if you want both doll and carriage. If you want the doll only send six subscriptions ($3 in all) and mention Reward No. 7806.

You Can Make The Most Beautiful Purses, Bags, Chains, Necklaces, Belts, Etc., With A Kanibas Bead Loom

Thousands of Beads and Designs

For a Club of Four

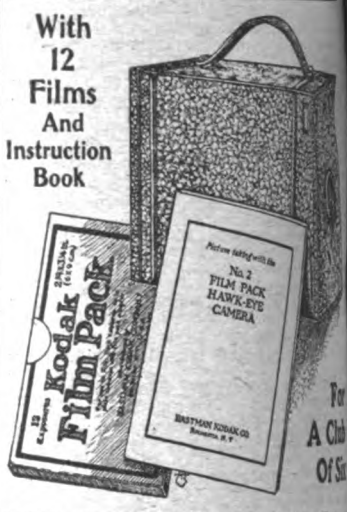
BEADWORK is all the rage again. And here is a wonderful yet simple Bead Loom with which any woman or girl can take up this fascinating work at home and easily make the handsomest bags, purses, necklaces, purses, belts, collars and cuffs, shirtwaist sets, trimmings, shirtwaist sets, slippers, watch cases, fob chains, card cases, pocketbooks, in fact there is no limit to the number and variety of exquisitely colored bead work patterns that can be woven on this Loom.

Anybody can use the "Kanibas" Bead Loom—it is very easy to understand as everything is clearly explained in the instruction book sent with the outfit.

Everything you need to work with is included free with the Loom, so you can begin making the articles at once.

In the outfit you will receive one "Kanibas" Bead Loom, packages of beads in assorted colors of black, white, blue, green, pink, etc., one dozen special bead needles (very long and slender with unusually long eye), one spool of specially prepared waxed bead thread, and a 44-page instruction book containing more than seventy-five photographs and designs of popular bead work together with easy, detailed instructions as to what color of beads to use and how to make them.

This book shows how to make different patterns of bags, chains, necklaces, purses, belts, collars and cuffs, shirtwaist sets, slippers, watch cases, fob chains, card cases, pocketbooks, dress trimmings, any letter in the alphabet, any monogram, etc., etc.,—giving full directions for all designs. The popular secret order emblems can be worked with great effect in beads for fob chains, bracelets, card cases, etc., and this book illustrates designs for Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Knights of Columbus, Elks, Royal Arcanum, also Christian Endeavor, Epworth League and others.



Any woman or girl will be delighted with the practical Loom Outfit because she can make many pretty things not only for her own use but to give away as presents and to sell. While the beads themselves cost but little, the fascinating work brings a high price so that there are big profits in the business, if one desires to sell the articles after they are made.

Special Club Offer. For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the "Kanibas" Bead Loom and Outfit free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8234.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Detecting Johne's Disease

IT has been mentioned several times in these columns that Johne's disease, also known as chronic bacterial dysentery of cattle, is extremely difficult to diagnose. Its symptoms are very similar to those of tuberculosis and both diseases may be present in the same animal at the same time. When tuberculosis is not present, however, the animal fails to react to the tuberculin test and determination of the disease has had to depend in the past upon a microscopic examination of the feces and scrapings of mucous membrane from the rectum. About the only symptom different from those present in ordinary dysentery is that the affected animal maintains almost normal appetite until the end, the disease always proving fatal. Progressive emaciation, despite maintained appetite, is another symptom of the disease. In view of these facts, stockmen will be glad to know that Drs. B. A. Beach and E. G. Hastings of the Wisconsin Experiment Station have succeeded in cultivating the causal germ of Johne's disease and from it producing a diagnostic agent called "johnin." This new biologic preparation is not yet available for use by veterinarians, but we trust they will be able to obtain it when it has been fully tested by its originators. In one herd, known to have been infected for 14 years, seven tests with johnin were made at intervals of from three to six months from June, 1917, to December, 1920. The number of reactors, reported by the investigators through the columns of the Journal of Infectious Diseases, were, in the successive tests, 5, 4, 6, 3, 4, 4 and 2. On repeating the test in June, 1921, no reactors were found, but it is not deemed at all certain that additional reactors will not be found in future tests. The specific organism that causes the disease, which is contagious and incurable, was found in all but one of the 28 animals reacting to johnin, thus showing that the test is reliable when positive.

OBSTRUCTED TEAT.—One of my young cows has her second calf. The left hind teat and right front teat is affected—the milk will not flow from udder into them. There seems to be a little lump smaller than a pea in each teat. Will you tell me what this is and what to do? W. H. P.

A.—If the growths are just inside the openings of the teats a veterinarian could remove them with a special instrument, but if they are located high it would be best to let a calf nurse or dry off the milk secretion in the affected quarters. Home treatment will not avail in such a condition.

BOG SPAVIN.—I have a mule eight years old that has a swollen hock. I worked her very hard all the fall to the wagon. I would like to have a remedy. L. F. P.

A.—It would be best to leave the puff alone as it does not cause lameness. If you prefer to try treatment, rub in some 10 per cent. iodin petrogen or vasogen twice daily or apply a proprietary reducing preparation which you can buy at a drug store with full instructions for use.

INDIGESTION.—Last spring our lambs died when they were six weeks old. First they would bloat then become stiff in all four quarters and about the second day diarrhea set in which usually lasted two days. At the first stage some of the lambs would eat dirt or sand and in about ten hours would die. On examining some of the dead lambs hard lumps of curdled milk, about the size of a hen's egg were found in their stomachs. Third crop alfalfa hay was fed to the ewes. C. B.

A.—The milk disagreed with the lambs and the alfalfa hay was a probable cause. It would be better to make the hay but a part of the roughage ration along with clover and other grasses. Make the ewes take active exercise every day. Feed them a little oats and bran if thin. Give lambs castor oil in milk when any symptom such as you mention is noticed. For bloat give a little turpentine in milk, or give lukewarm water tinged light pink with permanganate of potash.

WARTS.—My cow has warts in her ear and it is nearly full. It has been two or three months since they first came. There are two small ones on her body about the size of a twenty-five cent piece. What can I do? H. Y.

A.—Pull off the warts that have narrow necks. Cover the other warty places once or twice daily with a thick paste of equal quantities of cold-pressed castor oil, salt and flowers of sulphur. If you prefer, warts that have narrow necks may be snipped off with scissors, a few at a time, then apply tincture of iodin.

STAGGERING STEER.—I have a three-year-old steer that is getting fat, that staggers and sometimes falls as if he were partly paralyzed. He is intelligent and gentle. His head trembles. Do you think he may have been injured in any way? Would it be safe to kill him for beef? E. A. M.

A.—Loco poisoning causes symptoms somewhat like those described and may subside if the steer can be kept in a box-stall, shed or yard and given sound feed. We should advise trying that. Then if the animal thrives, puts on flesh and stops staggering it may be slaughtered for meat. A blow on the head or a lightning stroke or shock may also cause such symptoms.

GARGET.—Can you tell me what is the matter with my cow? She freshened last November. The front of the udder appears to be swollen. At times one teat has lumps in it which, when milked, looked like curdled milk. Is it advisable to use the milk from the other teats? She is in good condition, fat and hearty. I feed her cottonseed, shorts and bran. How does tuberculosis affect a cow? E. G. S.

A.—The milk of the affected quarter is unfit for any purpose and should be caught in a vessel containing a disinfecting solution and then thrown out in a place to which animals have not access. The milk from the other quarters may be used if the cow has been tested with tuberculin and did not prove to be tuberculous. That disease sometimes attacks the udder and causes the affected part to become hard like a tumor and it then does not yield milk. In most cases the tuberculous animal gradually becomes thin, is thriftless, weak and has a cough. The disease is incurable and contagious.

DEPRAVED APPETITE.—I have a gilt, seven months old, that eats dirt. What causes it, and is there a cure? E. J.

A.—Supply the gilt with air-slaked lime, salt and wood ashes or bone meal and clover or alfalfa hay. She will then be much less likely to eat dirt. If you see worms in the droppings, withhold food for 24 hours and then give from a bottle 30 drops of oil of chenopodium and one-half an ounce of castor oil for every 50 pounds of body weight. Repeat the treatment in two weeks.

MANGE.—There are times when my dog, three years old, won't eat. The hair is coming off his legs and feet and there are sores that look like mange. Please tell the trouble and what will cure. J. A. B.

A.—Clip off the hair and scrub the dog clean with soap and hot water. When dry rub in thoroughly, on affected parts, a mixture of four ounces each of oil of tar and flowers of sulphur and two teaspoonfuls of coal tar dip well mixed with one pound of melted unsalted lard. Stir until set. Repeat the application when seen to be necessary. Make dog take active outdoor exercise every day. Do not feed potatoes, pork or corn meal.

COWPOX.—I have a cow. Her udder is broken out with red pimples. The skin is rough and feels thick. She is so sore can hardly be milked. Is the milk fit for use? (2) I have a good work mule twelve years old that continually bites and gnaws at his side; the hair is off in places and broken out with yellow lumps. C. R.

A.—Bathe the udder and teats two or three times daily with hot water containing all the boric acid it will dissolve; then dry gently and paint the sores with a saturated solution of permanganate of potash. If any sore is obstinate in healing, apply strong iodin ointment twice a day. (2) It is to be feared that the mule is affected with farcy, the skin form of glanders. If so, he will have to be destroyed. Take him at once to a qualified veterinarian for examination. It may be some less serious disease, but in the circumstances we should not feel justified in prescribing treatment.

SORE ON FACE.—I have a pony that has sore eyes. Water runs from them and forms scabs which grow longer every day. It is not very bad in the summer time. As soon as cold weather comes he grows worse. I have used boric acid. A. E. S.

A.—The tear ducts are partially closed so that they do not carry off the tears and they flow over the cheeks, causing the sores described. Flies irritate and infect the sore place in summer. A veterinarian could clear the ducts and should be employed for that purpose. Meanwhile give the affected part a thorough cleansing, removing the scabs, and then apply daily an ointment composed of one part each of iodoform, tannic acid, boric acid and lard.

CHOREA.—Please tell me what is the matter with my three-months-old hound. He has a violent twitching of the muscles of his left front leg. Is there a cure, and what? W. T.

A.—The dog is afflicted with chorea (St. Vitus' dance) which is practically incurable. He may improve somewhat if made to live an active outdoor life and is generously fed. If he is a poor, weak animal you might as well end his misery by administering chloroform.

BLOOD IN MILK.—I have a young Jersey cow that started giving bloody milk in one teat last October. Sometimes the milk will be all right, other times will be pink and sometimes I milk pure blood from that teat. I have not saved her milk since I noticed it being bloody. I have given her two courses of hyposulphite of soda. I gave her one course dissolved in water as directed, waited about a month then gave her another course. Neither one seemed to do her any good. She is well fed on oats and timothy hay, also give her a quart of bran at a feed. G. W.

A.—Hyposulphite of soda does not serve the purpose in such cases. A dram of powdered copperas (dried sulphite of iron) and three teaspoonfuls of salt mixed in the evening feed may help, but if the cow is pregnant it would be safer to slightly acidulate her drinking water with dilute sulphuric acid. Bathing the udder with cold water and vinegar, equal parts, two or three times daily, helps when bleeding is due to a blow or to congestion just after calving. If growths in the teat cavity cause the bleeding they may be removed by a surgeon if close to the opening, otherwise it is best to let a calf nurse or to dry off the secretion of milk in the affected quarter. Bleeding due to chronic garget is incurable.

AILING PIG.—I have two pigs about four months old. One of them is all puffed up and hard to get its breath and doesn't appear to grow. It never plays with the other pig but stays in one place all the time. L. W.

A.—To expel worms of pig, withhold feed for 24 hours, then give 30 drops of oil of chenopodium and one-half ounce of castor oil for every 50 pounds of body weight. Give it from a bottle and repeat the treatment in two weeks. Have the pigs run out daily for exercise. Feed skim-milk and mixed meals and let them help themselves to clover or alfalfa hay, salt, ground limestone and woodashes or bone meal.

BROKEN WIND.—I have a horse of high breed, fat and slick. At times he has a breathing like the heaves but his sides do not jerk. There are times when hard work does not affect him. B. T.

A.—The horse may breathe easier if worked in a breast collar and with an overhead check line. A thick, short-necked horse sometimes mechanically chokes when pulling up hill or when the load is heavy and he gets his head down low. Wet all feed with lime-water. Do not feed bulky roughage at noon when he has to work.

Roughage for Idle Work Horses

"Economical feeding is of primary importance in caring for idle work horses during the winter months," says Prof. J. G. Fuller, of the animal husbandry department of the University of Wisconsin. He goes on to state that roughage such as hay, corn stover and straw furnish a large amount of net energy, and that they are far cheaper than concentrates. With roughage of good quality fed in sufficient quantity the idle horse may be maintained in good condition without supplementing the ration with any concentrate whatever.

Next to proper feeding, sufficient exercise and proper shelter are most important. According to an old Arab saying, "Rest and fat are the worst enemies of the horse." In the feeding and management of horses we must ever bear in mind that the horse is a creature of motion, and that exercise is imperative. A mature horse should receive regular exercise, traveling five or six miles a day to maintain good health. In the off season when farm work is slack, horses may be pastured until heavy snow; in the spring they may be turned out as soon as the snow is gone and the ground has become firm and more or less free from mud. In midwinter the barnyard will give room for exercise, if an occasional trip to town or to the woodlot is thrown in for good measure.

Protection from drafts is the first thing to consider in providing shelter for horses. Cool, well-ventilated quarters are far more desirable than warm, stuffy, poorly-ventilated stables. The idea that the stable must be warm to be comfortable is entirely erroneous. It is the overheated, unventilated stable that usually holds the soft, poor-conditioned horses. Fresh air and sunlight will go a long way to guaranteeing your stock against the common winter ailments.

Where good quality roughage is available in sufficient quantities it is neither necessary nor profitable to augment the rations with grain. In fact, it is likely to turn out the other way. When roughage is scarce it may be necessary to feed some grain, but in no case should more than half the usual work ration be fed daily. Ordinarily a fair winter allowance will range from five to seven or eight pounds per day. As spring approaches, the grain ration must be gradually increased in preparation for the strenuous work soon to come. A sudden change from reduced winter rations to full work allowances of both roughage and concentrates will often result in sickness or serious injury. On general principles, a good ration for a 1,400-pound work horse doing full work is 13 to 15 pounds of oats and 18 pounds of good quality mixed hay daily.

Questions and Answers

CURRANT CULTURE.—This spring I would like to set out some currant bushes. What varieties would be best suited to my part of the country? Please tell me how to set them out, and if they will grow here in clay soil. Should they be set out alone, or can they be grown between the rows in my young orchard? Any other information you care to give will be appreciated, for I have never had any experience with currants. MRS. M. W. L., Minn.

A.—The following varieties of currant are quite popular and are extensively grown in Minnesota, where they will survive winter weather without covering if they are grown in sheltered locations. Currants like a moist, cool soil, and should do well in your locality, even if the soil is a quite stiff clay. Nor do they object to shade, and for this reason are frequently used as orchard fillers. To set them out: Avoid planting along fences or in other locations where they will be almost certain to be choked out by weeds. Prepare soil well, using lots of well-rotted manure both before and after planting. Set the plants four feet apart in the row; have the rows six feet apart. Frequent shallow cultivation serves best, for deep cultivation is likely to injure the roots. During the first season especially the bushes need protection from insect pests and diseases. The worst insect pest is the currant worm which will strip the foliage from bushes in a few days. Spray with one teaspoonful of white hellebore in a gallon of water, using while freshly made. Currant borers which channel the stalks are controlled by removing infested stalks. The worst disease is mildew. Leaves first show white mold, then curl up and die. Protect against this disease by spraying with Bordeaux mixture when the leaves first appear; repeat two or three times during early summer, or oftener if the disease is known to be bad in the region.

ALFALFA TAINTS MILK.—Does alfalfa taint cow's milk in the spring? If so, how can this be prevented? C. L. D., Minnesota.

A.—We have no proof showing that alfalfa taints milk, though this seems likely in view of the fact that when cows are first allowed on early spring grass pasture the milk has a grassy flavor, as most dairymen know. This in a short time disappears, however, perhaps due to the ability of the cow's body to overcome or in some not fully understood way absorb the taint. Perhaps the safest plan would be to allow the cows on the alfalfa for say half a day, turning them out after the morning milking and removing them at noon. At night put them on grass pasture. Keep this up for two or three weeks. In that time the system should have become adjusted to the new diet, and the milk should be entirely free from taint.

PREVENTING BEAN AND PEA WEEVILS.—How can I prevent weevils from damaging our peas and beans? We grow both as crops to be thrashed and sold, but for the last three years have had poor luck due to these pests. J. McN., Michigan.

A.—Preventive measures will do much toward controlling weevils and reducing the damage they do to your peas and beans. Begin in the spring with weevil-free seed; don't plant your own, for it is almost certain to be smutted with the pests, and they will again cause losses. Then harvest the crop just as soon as possible, thresh, and store in a place where there is no danger of infestation from other farms adjoining. Fumigation with carbon disulphid is often practiced when beans or peas in storage are known to be weevily, but if clean seed is planted and harvested early this is seldom necessary.

MAKING STICKY FLY-PAPER.—I have been told that sticky fly-paper can be made at home a lot cheaper than it can be bought. Is this true? If so, how is it made? MRS. M. N. E., Ohio.

A.—Yes, sticky fly-paper can be easily and cheaply made at home. Take two pounds of rosin and one pint of castor oil. Heat together until the mixture looks like molasses. Do not heat too much or place over an extremely hot fire. A medium fire will do the work nicely. With an old paint brush spread the mixture thinly and evenly while hot over any kind of paper fairly strong that you have handy. Heavy wrapping paper is excellent for the purpose. Place around the rooms, in the milk house, beside the kitchen and cellar doors, or any place where flies gather. Sunny places are better than dark spots. As to cost, a dozen pieces of sticky fly-paper of newspaper size may be made for one cent. This is far less than store prices.

Deformities of the Back

Thousands of Remarkable Cases

An old lady, 72 years of age, who suffered for many years and was absolutely helpless, found relief. A man who was helpless, unable to rise from his chair, was riding horseback and playing tennis within a year. A little child, paralyzed, was playing about the house after wearing a Philo Burt Appliance three weeks. We have successfully treated more than 45,000 cases the past 20 years.

30 Days' Trial Free

We will prove its value in your own case. There is no reason why you should not accept our offer. The photographs show how light, cool, elastic and easily adjusted the Philo Burt Appliance is — how different from the old torturous plaster, leather or steel jackets.

Every sufferer with a weakened or deformed spine owes it to himself to investigate thoroughly. Price within reach of all.

by Governor Winthrop, with Boston crackers, three times a week. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts would never have been what it is today without fish balls and fish chowder.

Catherine, I warn you that you will have to gather your star fish by constellations. There are enough cousins going to write you about these to depopulate the whole piscatorial Milky Way of Homosassa Beach.

LOS ANGELES, 917 SOUTH BRONSON ST., CALIF.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I sincerely hope that you folks won't object to a letter from Hollywood! Honest, we folks out here in Movieland are not as wicked as you think. We believe we are pretty good, and most of us are too.

California is indeed a wonderful state, especially this part of it—meaning Los Angeles. Many of you, I am sure, would like to know all about the Land of Sunshine. I wish that I were intelligent enough to do justice to the subject, because if I were I would surely tell you of the many wonders of the ideal country. No, I am not a native son; I hail from Ohio. I am proud of my state, too; but like many others I have fallen in love with the Pacific coast. There are so many desirable things in life to be found here. The climate really is wonderful—flowers, fruit and vegetables to be had all the year round. And no snow! That pleases me most of all. And then we have such glorious sun-sets. It is really a privilege to live in Los Angeles.

The Pacific ocean is only a few miles away from our city, and so are many of its splendid beaches. Those of you who enjoy seeing Mack Sennett's bathing beauties in the movies really ought to visit these local beaches, for thousands of girls, as beautiful, are to be seen almost every day—weather permitting. Believe me, the Pacific sure does beat the "old swimming hole" back home.

At times one grows weary of too much of a good thing and wishes for a little good old-fashioned sure enuf winter, with its snow, ice, sleet, etc. At such times, all one has to do is to take to the mountains which are only a couple of hours ride away. Snow up to one's neck can always be found there. I must leave you all now before I wear out my welcome. I would enjoy hearing from those of you who can find the time to write. Do tell me all about your part of this great country of ours. I enjoy writing letters and will try my best to pen a worthwhile reply. I am not yet thirty, so I am still a young man. Best wishes to you all!

Your Hollywood nephew and cousin,
CHARLES URBAN.

Charlie, I see now where all the doubting Thomases and Jacks among the Family must go to receive a cure and answer for their aspersions on the feminine beauty of our country. They have but to walk entranced on the sands of the Pacific, where thousands of beauties, sunkist and wavekist, may be seen disporting themselves a la Mack Sennett. I hope your letter will not start so much of an emigration Charles, that the transcontinental roads will not be able to handle the rush of eastern nephews beachward bound. No wonder you have "fallen in love" with California and have no regret for the barren land of the Buckeye you have left behind. If it is "a privilege to live in Los Angeles," I'll say that you seem to be enjoying your privileges to the limit.

No, Charlie, I really do not believe Hollywood to be such a wicked place. Or perhaps I should say that I do not believe it to be any more foolishly wicked than all spots where too much money is flowing and has to be spent too often in wasteful and selfish ways that injure the spender and others. It happens that Hollywood has simply received the full glare of publicity's spotlight which might have been just as luridly directed on the white light and spending centers of our big eastern centers. In all these places the foolish and often fatal search for pleasure goes on. There is something very pitiful, too, Charles, about this and all that we call "wickedness." Analyzed it is but a seeking for happiness in the wrong way. Sometimes a tragedy lies at the end of the wrong-seeking. The huge sums which have been made in the gigantic growth of the motion picture industry have unsettled all past standards of living among those sharing in the golden flood which has poured from the silver screen. There have been prodigals who have spent suddenly gained wealth in sudden and easy ways. And so there have been lessons and examples. But I think that the prodigals are the exception and not the rule. The true growth of the motion picture industry, its making into an universal art, is to come later on when the present uneasy scramble is over and the faults and "wickedness" of prodigals and pioneers will be but history in the craft.

ROARING RIVER, BOX 55, N. C.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Morning! Here I hail from the Land of the Sky in the grandest state in the Union. How many agree with me? Only those of the Old North State. Naturally, for every one thinks his state greatest of all. So I'm a tar heel born and a tar heel bred, and when I die, I'm a tar heel dead. So much for that. Now shall I say it? Well, here goes: I want a seat between Augustus Trick and Frank Clark. Now girls, don't get jealous, for I'll promise not to flirt one bit. Gus, what kind of girls have you around your home? Please don't judge all of us by them. Come down to the mountains of North Carolina and I'll show you some real girls—painted by Nature's best. The "State of Wilkes" county is noted for its moonshine and good-looking girls.

Many thanks, Frank, for your consoling words. You've won the girls—although it is true there are girls as Gus has pictured them. But there are still some in our grand old Union with the highest of ideals—girls that aspire to be something more than social butterflies. I wonder if Gus ever saw one of this sort.

Shall I describe myself? I think not—perhaps next time, if Billy lets me pass. And I'll also describe the country around here.

Uncle Lisha, you are filling a great place. I admire you, and if you ever come to N. C., come around and I'll give you a spin in my car around some of these mountain roads and curves that will make you dizzy. But I'll bring you back safe. The Daniel Boone Highway is just one mile from town and is very picturesque. I'm sending you a picture of my home, Uncle.

Shinery Bove, you are a joke. Come again, when you have found those wives.

Write me, folks. I'll answer 'em if they don't get up in the millions.

Sincerely yours,
ETHYLE SALMONS.

You are a real Tar Baby, Ethyle, and the the tar is so sticky that you are just naturally all stuck up about your tarry and starry state. But you certainly have two things to be well proud of: If Wilkes county is famous for its "moonshine and good-looking girls," your section ought to be a sort of masculine Mecca. I hope the Southern railroad features these stimulating products of your country, Ethyle, and advertises special tourists' rates during the moonlight and moonshine seasons. That's when I'll arrive.

I see you live near Grandfather Mountain, Ethyle. I've heard a lot about this old grandpa hill and would like to see it and its grandchildren. During the excursion season when I come down to get my jug filled with white liquor, you will have to take me for that promised ride down through Goshen and Blowing Rock until I can get an eyeful of this old ancestor of your Carolina peaks. Ethyle we won't take any other girls or any "jelly beans" along on this dizzy spin of ours on the Dan Boone road. It will be just you and I and the moonshine and moonlight. I hope I may be able to get back safe and sober, but it seems to me that the chances are against my safety and soberness—all things considered.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for April

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Miss Willie G. Collier, Box 94, Como, Miss. Painfully afflicted with rheumatism and only to be aided by an aged and almost helpless father, this poor invalid asks for financial help. Mrs. E. Shifflet, R. R. 3, Richmond, Ky. This sad-hearted widow has lost her shut-in son Claude whose appeal has previously appeared here. With her thirteen-year old daughter, Mrs. Shifflet is left to struggle bravely on. Let's help her in her grief and her fight for self-support. Mrs. Mary Dillon, Route 1, Box 23, Leapswill, N. C. At the age of 72 and with a shut-in daughter, this worthy woman asks for clothing, quilt pieces, or any help or cheer which may be sent. Miss Louvenia Miller, Rumsey, Ky. This is a sufferer from asthma for over fifteen years, confined to her room and often to her bed. Her mother is 75 and her father 84. She asks for quilt pieces, warm clothing, reading matter, and anything which will give her fingers and mind work to do. Mrs. Minnie Mollitt, Davisport, Ky. A widow with six children of whom the oldest is but eight years of age, this poor woman's case is indeed pitiful. She cannot properly care for her children without clothing and cash. Ben Oney, Hager Hill, Ky. Nearly blind, and with an invalid wife and three young children it is not surprising that this poor man's condition is described as "destitute." Help him for his own and for his children's sake. The oldest child is nine. Lizzie Collins, Kingsport, Tenn, Route 1. Deserted by her husband and left with a young child to care for and support, this life-wrecked woman asks aid, clothing particularly. She has been hard-working and will aid herself when she can, but she is helpless now through illness. Mrs. Dora Underwood, Meadows of Dan, Va. A widow, with five children. The oldest child is a crippled girl of nine. A pitiful appeal which deserves an answer.

The winter is over for most of us, and April is granting us promises of warmth and sunlight. In our happiness of the Spring, let us not forget that shut-in days and the grip of hunger and poverty are not at an end for those whose appeals are pitifully sounded this month. What help you can give, what cheer you can send, give and send it now—just as God gives us the Spring again and the green living things which are soon to be about us as keep us glad.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C." a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, as after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

FREE! COMFORT'S New Applique And Patchwork Book

WE have recently published a book of 32 pages showing nearly one hundred beautiful designs in applique and patchwork sent in by women readers of COMFORT.

These designs, which are handsomely illustrated and accompanied with full directions for making the bedspreads, shams, breakfast cloths, luncheon sets, scarfs, curtains, pillows, quilts, etc., etc., also hints and sections for borders and connections, designs which can be used as appliques for various purposes among which are birds, tulips, daffodils, roses, fleur de lis, peach, grapes, basketsmorning glories, fleur de lis, peach, grapes, star and crescent and others too numerous to mention. You will marvel at the beautiful work you can do with this book as your guide. The designs are attractive yet simple and easy to make, and as they were submitted by our own readers they are entirely different from any others you may have seen.

You can have a copy of this book free if you will accept the following special offer:

Given To You! For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you the new Applique and Patchwork Book free by mail postpaid. Reward No. 8731.

16-Piece Aluminum Set

For A Club Of Only Five

TO describe the many virtues of this splendid Aluminum Set seems unnecessary. Every good housewife knows what it means to have kitchen utensils made of this bright, handsome, light-weight, sanitary metal that is so easy to keep clean, that never "peels," rusts or corrodes and never wears out.

As shown in our illustration, this big-value Kitchen Set consists of the following named pieces, all pure aluminum—16 of them in all: Six Teaspoons, Six Tablespoons, One Whole Mixing Spoon, One Ladle, One Slotted Mixing Spoon and One Cake Beater.

Please bear in mind that each and every piece is full standard size for every-day use in the home and the set as a whole is in every way equal to those sold at high prices in the retail stores today. We buy direct from the manufacturer, however, and in large quantities, thereby securing the lowest factory price. As a result we can afford to give away this set for a very small club of subscriptions.

Given To You! For a club of five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this genuine Aluminum 16-piece Kitchen Set, free by Parcel Post, prepaid. Reward No. 7615.

Parrot Nabs "Stinkpots"

(By Plain Dealer Wire)

Chicago.—"Stinkpot! Stinkpot! Stinkpot!" Three men, all smoking vigorously, were brought to a halt in Zion City.

"Stinkpot! Stinkpot! Stinkpot!" Three cigars dropped from as many open mouths.

"Whoja spose is callin' us that?" said one of the smokers looking around.

"Don't know; I can't see any one," said another.

"Stinkpot, Stinkpot, Stinkpot, cra-a-ack, cra-ack-ha-haha, Stinkpot."

"Well, if it ain't a parrot," said the first smoker. "Made me drop my cigar, too. It was a fifteen center. What?"

"You're under arrest," said a stranger in blue who had driven up swiftly in an auto.

"You've been violating the anti-tobacco ordinance. Joke's on you, too. Dr. Voliva's parrot gave you away. He's a good one that parrot. Helps us catch lots of you smokers. Jump in now and I'll give you all a ride to the station."

The three offenders were Ralph McComsey, Oswald Garff and James Wekes. They declared they were coming back someday and get even with Voliva's parrot who has been trained by his master to betray those who use the weed.

"Stinkpot," is the euphonious term coined by Voliva, successor to John Alexander Dowie, as a rebuke to smokers.

To the Rescue

Bill Smith, country storekeeper, motored to the city to buy goods. They were sent immediately and reached home before he did. When the boxes were dropped off the truck in front of the store, Mrs. Smith, who had taken charge, uttered a scream, seized a hatchet, and started to open the largest one.

"What's the matter, Mother?" said one of her children, who watched her in amazement.

Pale and faint, Mrs. Smith pointed to an inscription on the box. It read, "Bill inside." —The Automobilist.

Outguesses Him

First woman: "My dear, we have been married goin' on forty years, an' my husband ain't never deceived me yet!"

Second woman: "Well, now! Ain't that nice?"

First woman: "Yes, ain't it? I kin tell when he's lyin' every time."—Life.

New Set with Large Roomy Divan

Only $1.00 with the coupon below brings this sensational furniture bargain to your home on 30 days trial. Straus & Schram's newest offer—a complete 6-piece set of fumed solid oak living room furniture including a wonderfully comfortable and roomy divan and at a positively sensational price reduction.

Only $29.85 for the complete set on this offer—on easy payments of only $2.70 a month, and at a price much lower than you would have to pay the local dealer for spot cash. $40 was the former price for a set like this; a special factory sacrifice makes this slash in price possible now. The factory needed cash to keep their employes working. So they offered to make us a large number of these handsome 6-piece sets "without consideration for cost or profit." This permits us to make a truly sensational offer to the public, even in these price-smashing times! The factory's loss is your gain. So seize this unusal opportunity on our special approval offer. We take all the risk.

New 6-Piece Set Fumed Solid Oak

This superb 6-piece set is made of selected solid oak throughout, finished in rich, dull waxed, brown fumed oak. All four pieces are padded, seats upholstered with brown Delavan Spanish leather, the best imitation of genuine Spanish leather known. The upholstering is of a rich brown color, and will give you the best possible service.

Large Divan will give extra seating capacity to your library, living room or parlor. It is an unusually massive comfortable piece with beautifully designed back. Arms are broad and comfortable. Measures 46 inches wide outside and 36 inches long inside. Thickly padded seat is 19 inches deep. Height of back 22 inches. Posts are extra massive.

Arm Chair is a roomy, dignified piece of furniture, comfortable and big enough for a very large person while not seeming too large for the ordinary occupant. Seat 19 x 17½ in. Height 36 in.

Arm Rocker is a massive, stately, comfortable piece with beautifully designed back, wide and shapely arms, and smooth, operating runners. Seat, 19 x 17½ in., height 36 in.

Sewing Rocker is unusually attractive and useful. Seat 17 x 17 inches. Height 35 inches.

Library Table — a beautiful piece of library furniture. Has beautifully designed ends to match the chairs, with roomy magazine shelf below. Legs cut of 2-inch stock. Massive, dignified. Top measures 23¼ x 34 inches.

Jardiniere Stand matches other pieces. A decoration to your living room or library. Carefully built throughout. Measures 17½ inches high, the top 12 x 12 inches.

Entire set is shipped knocked down construction. Very easy to set up. Saves in freight charges. Weight about 175 pounds.

Order by No. B6944A. $1.00 with coupon, $2.70 a month, price $29.85.

30 Days Trial

When you get this magnificent 6-piece library set, put it in your living room or library and use it freely for 30 days. Before you pay another penny, examine it thoroughly. Note the massive solid construction—the beautiful fumed oak finish—the fine upholstery and graceful lines. Convince yourself that this beautiful set will make your home brighter and more beautiful. Compare it with anything you can buy locally at anywhere near the same price—even for spot cash. Then if not satisfied for any reason and convinced that this is a stupendous bargain—you alone to judge—return the set at our expense and we will refund your $1.00 at once, plus any freight charges you paid.

Only $2.70 a Month

If you decide to keep the set, start paying only $2.70 a month until you have paid $29.85—payments so low and so convenient that you will scarcely feel them while you enjoy the proud ownership of so magnificent a set of furniture. A full year to pay—at the rate of only a few cents a day, less than one fritters away every day for trifles. This wonderful value is not listed in our regular catalog. We have only a limited number of sets which we reserve for this acquaintance offer to new customers. We send our complete catalog when we ship the set. We trust honest people anywhere in the U.S. One price, cash or credit. No discount for cash, nothing extra for credit, no C.O.D.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

The "Lame Duck" Congress Is a Constitutional Evil that Should Be Remedied

AT the outset a definition is in order for the benefit of such of our readers as may not be cognizant of the political significance of the phrase "lame duck" which, in news items and editorial comments during the past winter, has been overworked as an epithet to stigmatize the Sixty-Seventh Congress as a whole, and certain of its members in particular, throughout its final session that opened on December 4th, 1922, and closed on the fourth day of last March. Bear in mind that the members of the Sixty-Seventh Congress were elected in the fall of 1920 to serve for the term of two years which began March 4th, 1921, and ended March 4th, 1923; also that last fall (November 7th in all States except Maine which elects its congressmen in September) the members of a new Congress were elected to serve for the term of two years beginning with March 4th, 1923, and that, therefore, the above mentioned session of the old Congress was begun and held after a new Congress had been elected to succeed it. The election resulted in a notable change of personel, largely due to the defeat, at the polls, of a considerable number of the members of the Sixty-Seventh Congress who were candidates for reelection. The members of the Sixty-Seventh Congress who were not reelected, but continued to serve (as was their legal right) through the winter session of 1922-3, were nicknamed "lame ducks"; and because they were so numerous, including Mr. Volstead, of Minnesota, and a number of other notables, this nickname was also applied to this Congress, as a whole, throughout its final session.

Strange as it may seem, such is, and since the Constitution of the United States went into effect on March 4th, 1789, ever has been the law. Not only does each Congress hold over nearly four months (from early in November until the fourth day of the following March) after the succeeding Congress has been elected, but each new Congress, though elected in November for a two-year term to begin the fourth of the following March, does not assemble for its first session until the first Monday of December in the next year, nearly thirteen months after its election to office, unless the President should deem it necessary to call an extraordinary session between March fourth and December. Everybody, of course, knows that the President is elected in November for a four-year term, but is not inducted into office (inaugurated) until the 4th day of the following March, and during the intervening four months his predecessor holds over.

This interval of four months between the election and inauguration of the President might have been reasonably necessary a hundred and thirty-four years ago when the means of travel and communication were slow and difficult. But now, that one can easily travel more miles in a day than the framers of the Constitution could have covered in a week, the utter absurdity of still holding to the old-time program, no longer necessary or excusable, whereby the President and Congress still continue to administer the Government and legislate for the country for four months after their successors have been elected, very likely with an opposite political mandate, would appear ludicrous were it not for the serious inconvenience that results and the possibilities of grave danger involved. And this menace is not merely theoretical or imaginary, but has actually arisen in awsome form with threatened disaster that has been escaped but narrowly in more than one instance.

Not more than five weeks need or should intervene between a national election and the inauguration of the President-elect or the assembling of a newly elected Congress. This period would afford ample time to count the votes, get in the election returns, declare the result and start the newly elected administration functioning. No longer is there any excuse for the periodical recurrence of the "lame duck" Congress and "lame duck" Presidential hold-over, and that part of the organic law from which they spring should be so amended as to obviate both of these archaic anomalies.

The great desirability, if not absolutely necessity, of such a change is so manifest that a movement to bring it about has recently been agitated, and is receiving much favorable comment and, so far as we are informed, is meeting with no unfavorable criticism or opposition. The public discussion of the project has elicited some valuable suggestions as to details for working out the proposed change. The simplest and best that has come to our attention is, in substance, as follows: (1) Amend the Constitution so as to make the respective terms of office of President, Vice-President, U. S. Senators and Congressmen begin and terminate at noon on the first Tuesday of December, which thus would become Inauguration Day, and require Congress to assemble in regular session each year on the first Wednesday following the first Tuesday in December. (2) Congress has power to prescribe the time for holding the national election, which for many years has been and still is the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November. This could be changed to the fifth Tuesday before the first Tuesday of December in order to give five full weeks between the election of President, Vice-President, Senators and Congressmen and their installation in office. This interval should, as previously stated, be sufficient for the performance of all preliminary acts required to be done between these two dates. By this arrangement the national election would come on the first Tuesday of November in some years, in other years on the last Tuesday of October, which is very close to the time prescribed by the present law.

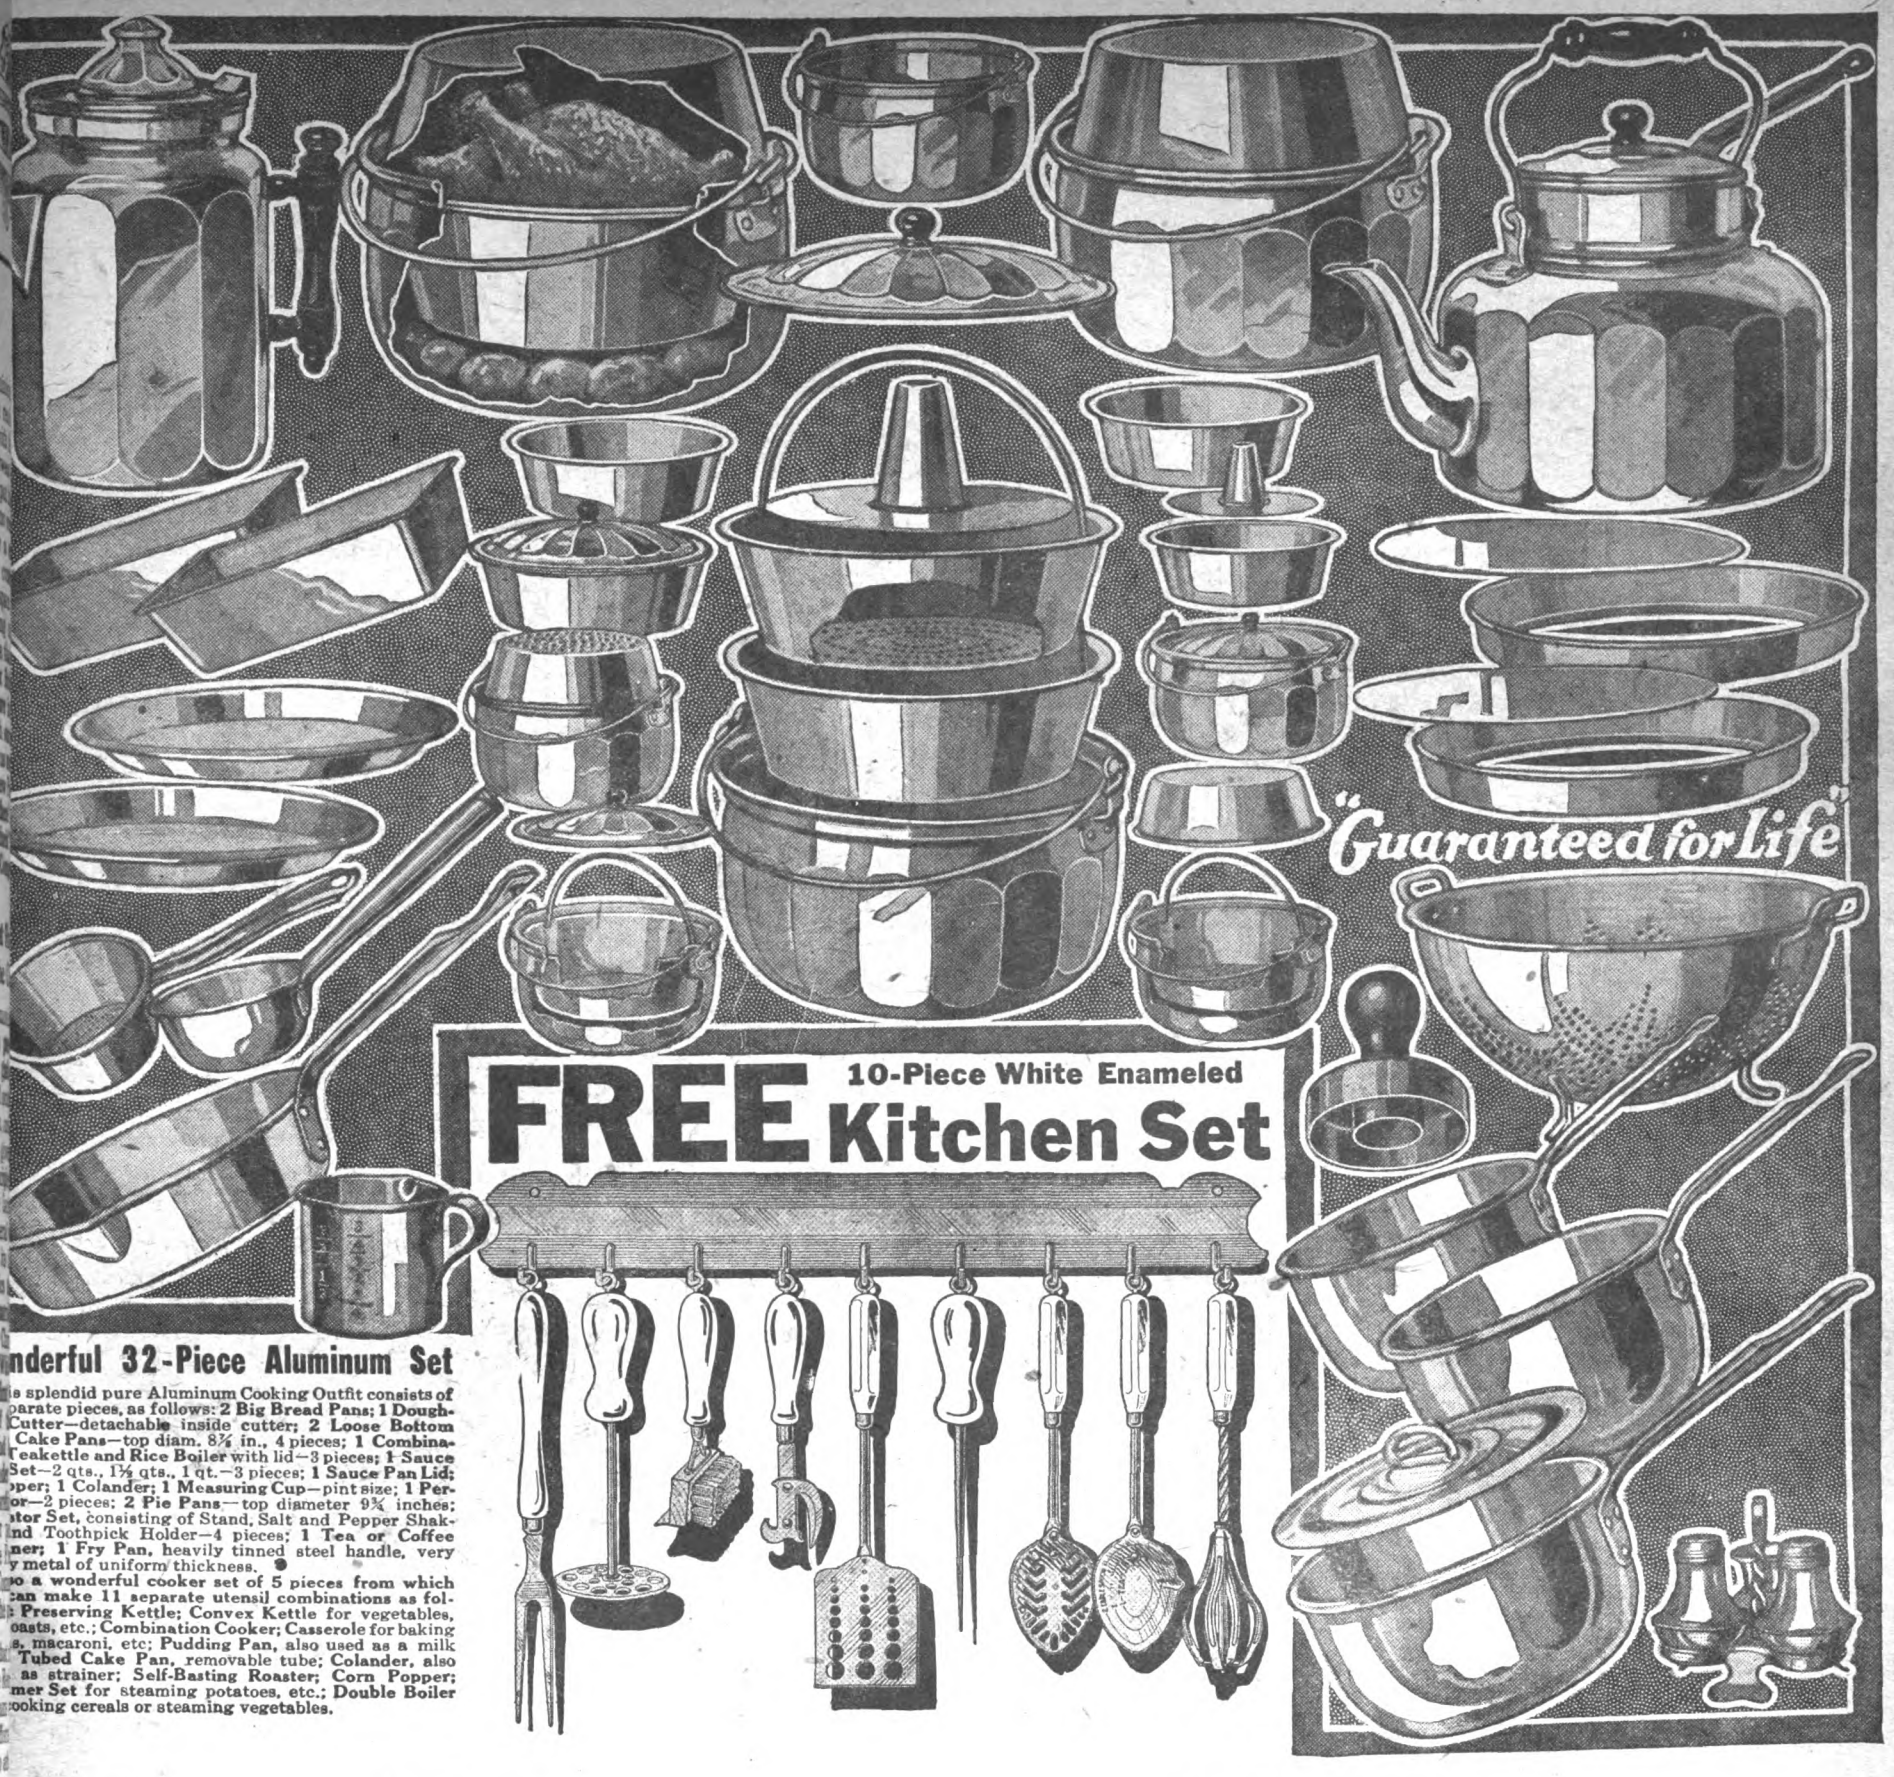
No matter how decisively the people vote for a change of party, personel and policy in the White House and in the halls of Congress, the repudiated President and rejected law-makers, under the present system, retain their power for four months and, as a rule in such cases, have taken advantage of the period of their hold-over to embarrass the incoming administration. It is an evil under any circumstances, and how disastrous might be the consequences of a crisis in our national affairs happening to come during the hold-over preceding a change of administration from one political party to another is illustrated by the conditions that developed in the interim between Lincoln's election in November, 1860, and his inauguration as President in the following March. In those trying four months he was perforce a passive observer of momentous events trending toward a crisis that portended civil war as seven Southern States seceded from the Union and organized the Confederacy while he was awaiting the appointed time for him to receive the reins of government from the hands of President Buchanan who, meanwhile, made no attempt to prevent the calamity. Had Lincoln been inaugurated early in December, instead of in the following March, he would have devoted his mighty energy ceaselessly through that winter to an effort to reconcile the distrustful factions and save the Union without a resort to force of arms. And who now would venture to say but that he might have succeeded if the Constitution had afforded him the opportunity, as President, to bring to bear the influence of his wonderful tact, goodness of heart and greatness of soul in this formative period, before affairs had reached the irrevocable stage at which he found them on the 4th of March. Lincoln's opinion as to the possibilities of the situation are reflected in his regretful expression: "I only wish I could have got there before the horse was stolen."

The country has experienced some narrow escapes from the danger that ever lurks in the hold-over. One was in the latter part of Lincoln's first term. Shortly before the national election of November, 1864, in view of the possibility of his failure to win a reelection, and in order to minimize so far as possible the embarrassing consequences of a change of administration in the midst of war, President Lincoln resolved, in case of his defeat, "to so cooperate with the President elect as to save the Union between the election and the inauguration." And he put his resolution in writing at the time, but had no occasion to act on it because he was elected to a second term. Other similar instances in our country's history could be cited but for lack of space. In Europe there is no such delay in getting newly elected governments into action. In less than a fortnight after a general election in Great Britain the new ministry and new Parliament are in the harness and pulling together. Even with our more extensive territory it should not take us more than two or three times as long to get a new President and new Congress into gear. "Over there" they do not tolerate legislation by a "lame duck" Parliament; neither should a "lame duck" Congress be permitted to function here.

Russian Soviet Government Has No Use for God, Religion or the Church

THE propagandists of Communism gather a considerable following by presenting their theories in an attractive garb of specious argument and impassioned oratory that conceals the grinning skeleton within, and leads many to the mistaken belief that a government and social order founded on the principles they advocate would be productive of the largest measure of prosperity, happiness and general well-being to the community. But stript of its disguise it is so antagonistic to Christian ethics that wherever the Communists have gained control of the government they have attacked the Christian church and tried to abolish religion. While the Communists ruled France, after the first French revolution, they robbed and closed the churches, beheaded many of the clergy and banished the rest, forbidding their return under penalty of death, prohibited Christian worship, abolished Sunday and established a secular period of ten days in place of the week. The French people after a while revolted against Communism and established religion and recalled the priests.

The Communist government that rules Russia is following in the footsteps of the Reds who ruled France a hundred and thirty years ago, and is boasting of better success in its efforts to win the populace over from Christianity to atheism. The Russian people, and especially the peasants, in the days of the Czars were devoutly, almost fanatically religious, and their churches were veritable treasure houses of gold and silver images, ornaments and decorations set with precious stones of an aggregate value of many million dollars. All this immense wealth has been confiscated by the Soviet government, but it is reported that much of this sacred plunder was appropriated by corrupt officials and never reached the public treasury. The clergy are cruelly persecuted by the Communist rulers, many are in prison, many have been shot, and a considerable number are under sentence of death soon to be executed. Soviet officials take pride in reporting, as evidence of the spread of Communism, that in some sections the peasants are pulling down the churches and dividing the material, and a leading Moscow paper says: "We must sweep the church out of our path, for it retards progress toward culture."



The most shockingly blasphemous example of the Russian government's shamelessness is the report of the mock trial that was held at the military club, in Moscow, January 27, in which God was put on trial as the accused. Evidence was presented for and against God, as a counter-revolutionary power, and arguments were delivered by the defense and by the prosecution. The proceedings closed with a verdict of "guilty." Five thousand Red Army officers and soldiers witnessed the trial, and Leon Trotzky, Minister of War, and Secretary Lunatsharsky took part.

Brownie's Triumph

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

Her tall figure was clad in rich white silk, with raised figures of gold maize wrought upon it.

"Where did you get it?" he demanded somewhat impatiently.

Isabel started at the sound as if a wasp had stung her.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Brownie Douglas, waiting at Memorial Hall, Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, is joined by her friend, Aspasia Huntington, a wealthy Baltimore belle, who meets with a slight accident in her dress, attracting the attention of two gentlemen, Adrian Dredmond, an Englishman, and Mr. Gordon who recognizes Brownie, she being an intimate friend of his sisters. Her father, dying before she is born, and her mother at her birth, she is adopted by her great aunt, who gives her her name Mehetabel and brings her up to remember she is a direct descendant from the Scottish nobility. Her nurse calls her Brownie from the first. Adrian Dredmond, stepping upon something, picks up a costly cuff button with a large D, studded with brilliants, and the word "Brownie" in finest letters upon the back. That night Miss Mehetabel Douglas tells Brownie the story of her life, her betrothal to Lord Dunforth, the ball given by Helen Capel's aunt, Lady Ruxley, her introduction to Count de Lussan, a man of questionable reputation, her refusal to cancel a dance at Lord Dunforth's command, Helen Capel's treachery in suppressing a note, her serious illness, her coming to America, where her father and mother soon died. She gives Brownie her jewels, including her engagement ring, coral cross and all other gifts from Lord Dunforth, and when she is gone she requests her to take the chain and key from her neck and wear it as long as she lives. That night she dies and upon the reading of the will Mr. Conrad, who has the care of her aunt's property, admits using and losing money entrusted to him, leaving Brownie, after all debts and legacies to the servants are paid, two hundred dollars. Refusing help, she secures employment wiring hats. She is helped by Mattie Burnham, who wins her love, and in the public library Brownie, reading to her in French, attracts the attention of an elderly gentleman who asks if she is a teacher and speaks any other language, and would she be persuaded to teach. If the opportunity presented itself she would and mentions Ware and Coolidge where she is employed. His card bears the name of Wm. H. Alcott, M. D., who recommends her to his son-in-law, Mr. Coolidge, as being competent to superintend the education of his two younger daughters and to be a companion and interpreter on a proposed trip to Europe. Going to the Coolidge home, Mrs. Coolidge and the eldest daughter Isabel admit her personal charms but are jealous of her beauty and many accomplishments and hope her meeting Wilbur will be avoided. The wish fails. Boarding the steamer, Brownie is saved from an accident by Adrian Dredmond. Wilbur relieves him of further care and takes her to his mother and sister who realize Wilbur's infatuation for Brownie. Adrian Dredmond overhears their determination to prevent Wilbur's further attention. Going to London they take a house near where Miss Mehetabel lived. Wilbur buys tickets for the opera and insists that Miss Douglas shall go, too. Selecting her jewels, among which is a coral cross, Mrs. Coolidge is surprised to find her so radiant and decides it shall not occur again. Adrian Dredmond entering the Coolidge box, is introduced to Brownie and leaving escorts her to the carriage, where she receives insults from Mrs. Coolidge. Isabel, envious of Brownie's elegant dress and jewels, queries to her mother Brownie's honesty. Seeing her go for a walk, Isabel enters Brownie's room and securing her jewels takes them to her mother, who requests that Brownie, upon her return, be sent to her. She asks Brownie if she has anything in her possession not legally hers and accuses her of stealing jewels and clothing. Brownie questions her right to ask her, to enter her room and from under lock and key take her jewels and demands the return of the casket. Mrs. Coolidge, refusing, Brownie threatens legal measures for their return. Wilbur intercedes and promises upon his father's return justice shall be done. Knowing she is to leave he offers her the love and care that will protect. She refuses. Wilbur orders a cab and directs that Brownie be driven to "The Washington." Adrian Dredmond calls, requesting to see Miss Douglas. Isabel gives a wrong impression and their pain in learning she is dishonest. Asking for her address, she does not know and he leaves distressed and indignant. Wilbur sends it and Adrian going to "The Washington" fails to find her. Mr. Coolidge hires a detective without success.

CHAPTER XIX.

A STARTLING RECOGNITION.

MEANWHILE the day for Lady Peasewell's drawing-room dawned Isabel Coolidge spared no pains or expense to make herself captivating for the occasion, and she succeeded admirably.

Her father's unexpected return, and his anger at her own and her mother's treatment of Miss Douglas, had threatened to upset all her plans, however.

He demanded that the jewels be brought to him, and another exciting scene ensued over them.

It must be confessed that he was somewhat confounded himself when he beheld them, and a feeling of doubt entered his mind regarding Brownie's honesty; but he would not confess it to his family, and censured them in no light terms for the dishonorable way in which they had become possessed of the rare stones.

It all ended in angry tears on the mother's and daughter's part, and in his taking charge of those unfortunate trinkets which had caused so much trouble, and locking them securely in his safe.

Isabel dawdled away the morning in a state of fretful unhappiness, and declared to herself, over and over again, that her appearance would be ruined without the governess's jewels.

After dinner, however, her father complained of a raging headache; two hours later he was in a high fever, and all thoughts of his attending the evening's festivities were relinquished.

From that moment Isabel's spirits rose, the clouds vanished from her brow, and she was even heard humming a gay opera air.

"Wilbur can act as our escort, mamma; so we shall be all right," she said, when her mother complained of the circumstance as spoiling all their pleasure.

"I have no heart for it, and would not go myself, were it not on your account," she replied, wearily.

Her husband's displeasure, and the fate of the missing governess, still weighed heavily on her conscience.

A few hours later she and Wilbur were waiting in the drawing-room for Isabel to make her appearance.

"Does my amiable sister contemplate a brilliant conquest tonight, that she is so long making her toilet?" sneered the young man, who had been pressed into the service, and was impatient of the delay.

"Do speak a little more kindly of Isabel, my son," said Mrs. Coolidge, adding, with a heavy sigh: "In all probability she will marry some day, and it is desirable that she should make a good match."

"Certainly; only there may be a difference of opinion as to what a 'good match' is," he returned, sarcastically.

"I consider any one who occupies a good position in the world, and who has plenty of money, an eligible parti."

"Regardless of either heart, brain, or principles," interrupted Wilbur, cynically.

"Why will you be so disagreeable, Wilbur? Of course, I expect your sister will exercise good judgment in the matter, and I have no fear of her letting herself down, or losing her head by any silly nonsense," retorted Mrs. Coolidge, pointedly.

Wilbur understood her insinuation perfectly, but would not notice it enough to reply, and just then the rustle of rich, trailing garments was heard upon the stairs.

A moment later the door opened, and Isabel entered.

There was an instant's silence as both mother and son turned to contemplate her.

"Isabel!" exclaimed the former, in tones of gratified pride.

"Whew!" whistled her brother, under his breath.

There was cause, truly, for these ejaculations of pleasure and surprise, for the young girl certainly had the appearance of a queen, and, for the first time in her life, she was handsome.

Her tall figure was clad in a rich white silk, with raised figures of golden maize wrought upon it. It fitted her elegantly, and swept out behind her in a graceful train. It was very simply made, being trimmed only by a fall of elegant lace from the low-cut corsage and sleeves. Its very richness was enough in itself.

Her hair was arranged a la coronet, around which glistened Brownie's lovely tiara of pearls, opals and diamonds; while upon her neck she wore the wonderful diamond necklace, from which was suspended the cross which matched the tiara. Upon her white arms she wore her own bracelets, which, although not so rich as the necklace, yet went with it very well.

She was absolutely perfect and dazzling, from the crown of her haughty head to the sole of her elegantly embroidered satin slippers.

"Will I do, mamma?" she asked, enjoying their silent admiration, and sweeping Mrs. Coolidge a profound courtesy.

"Where did you find those ornaments?" her mother asked, nervously, and unheeding her question, while Wilbur scowled his disapprobation savagely.

"Why, you know papa is sick, and it was a very easy matter to get his keys, unlock his private desk, and get them," she said, and laughed lightly, although secretly she was anxious lest there should be another scene.

"He would be very angry, Isabel, if he knew it," returned her mother, trying to speak severely, yet, in her heart, gloating over her daughter's magnificent appearance.

"I cannot help it, mamma. I had set my heart upon wearing them; they set off my dress superbly; and I was bound I would not be disappointed. He need never know it, for I can return them just as soon as we get home again, and no one will be harmed," she replied, willfully.

"Your sense of honor is extremely delicate, surely, Isabel," said Wilbur, mockingly.

"No one asked your opinion, and you can just hold your tongue. I shall go to Lady Peasewell's just as I am, and he may help it who can!" she retorted, rudely, and they knew it would be useless to say anything more to her.

"Isabel, you do look magnificent!" whispered Mrs. Coolidge, when they had arrived at Lady Peasewell's, and were in the dressing-room putting the last touches to their toilet.

"Don't I? I tell you this was worth a little finesse," she replied, surveying herself admiringly in the double swinging mirrors; and her mother, in her heart, was glad that she had succeeded in getting the jewels, although she feared the consequences should the fact be discovered.

"Who is that queenly girl?" asked a fine-looking young man of another.

They were standing in the doorway leading from the dancing-room to the conservatory, where they had been watching the dancers for the last ten minutes.

Isabel had just swept by them in all her elegance, and it was he who had called forth the above question.

"That is a Miss Coolidge. She is an American, and belongs to a very wealthy family, who are spending a year abroad."

"I should judge she did belong to a wealthy family from her appearance. Why, she has at least a thousand pounds in diamonds on her!" said the first speaker.

"She is a stunner, eh?"

"She is that. She is the most striking woman present this evening; and yet, aside from her jewels, her dress is the most simple. Do you know her?"

"Yes; I have met her several times."

"Will you introduce me?"

"Certainly, Sir Charles."

A few moments later, as Isabel was resting after her dance, she saw two gentlemen approaching her.

"Miss Coolidge, allow me to present Sir Charles Randal, who requests the pleasure of an introduction to you."

Sir Charles bowed low, and Miss Coolidge, rising, swept him a graceful courtesy, and soon after was again circling around the room, supported upon the arm of a baronet.

She had heard of Sir Charles Randal but had never seen him before. She knew he was reputed to be very wealthy, being an only son, and there was a prospect of more property to come in the future from a rich old aunt.

She had watched long for the appearance of Adrian Dredmond, hoping to captivate him at once by her charms. But when he did come, he only noticed her presence by the haughtiest bow, and a scornful curl of his lips, as his eyes fell upon the jewels she wore. He had never seen them before, but instinct told him at once that they were the ones which had caused so much trouble, and he despised her so heartily that she knew at once that all hope of winning him was useless.

Therefore, after her introduction to Sir Charles, she had said to herself that the next best thing to a lord was a baronet, and being a very attractive, noble-looking man, she exerted herself to charm him.

That night was one long to be remembered by Isabel Coolidge!

She was, indeed, as Sir Charles had said, the most striking-looking woman in the room. Admirers flocked around her, introductions pressed upon her, men raved about her, and women yielded the palm to her for the time being; and for once she realized that she was being borne upon the topmost wave of popularity.

Mrs. Coolidge was in her element, and deemed it the proudest moment of her life, and the castles which she reared for her daughter in imagination were of the grandest character.

Sir Charles was evidently very much interested in the fair American, and certainly if she had only been as pure and beautiful at heart as she seemed, she would have been well worthy of all the admiration which she excited.

After his third dance with her he led her away to the conservatory to rest.

As they were passing through the crowd they met a white-haired, royal-looking gentleman, who, as his eyes rested upon Isabel's, suddenly paused, started on, then turned back again and gave her a keen, searching glance, and finally moved on, after bowing to her companion.

"Who was that?" she asked, strangely interested, and vainly attributing the man's queer actions to admiration of herself.

"That was his lordship, the Earl of Dunforth," was the reply.

Sir Charles led her to a seat beneath a spreading palm tree, then excusing himself, he went to get her an ice.

She had danced a great deal, and was tired and heated.

With a sigh of content, she leaned back in her seat, and drew off her gloves.

Upon the forefinger of her left hand there gleamed Miss Mehetabel's engagement ring, its central pearl surrounded with its six pure brilliants.

She had been determined to make the most of her opportunity that evening, fearing she would never have another and while parting on the other jewels, this had caught her fancy, and she had slipped it upon her finger.

Sir Charles was detained longer than he had intended to be gone, and while she sat there silently thinking, her hand carelessly resting upon the back of the seat, she was suddenly startled by having it seized by some one behind her, in a grip of iron, while a voice, hoarse with suppressed feeling, said:

"Where did you get this? Young woman, where did you get this ring?"

She started to her feet, and turning quickly, found herself face to face with that white-haired, stately-looking man whom in a few moments before she had inquired about—Lord Dunforth!

To say that she was startled is to say the very least, for the man's face was as white as his hair, his eyes dilated and fixed upon the ring, his lips set and livid, while the hand which grasped hers shook as if he had been stricken with the palsy.

"Where did you get it?" he demanded again, this time somewhat impatiently.

Then, as she still continued silent from fear, and not knowing how to answer him, he looked up in her face.

"And this!—and this!—oh, God! and this!" he cried, as his eyes caught the gleam of the other jewels, his voice rising in pain with each word, as he touched, first the cross, then the necklace, and last the glittering tiara upon her golden head.

She began to think him a lunatic, or else that the gems were bewitched and were about to get her into deeper trouble.

"They—they are heirlooms," she finally managed to articulate, and speaking at random.

"Did she give them to you?"

"Whom?"

"Meta—my Meta—Mehetabel Douglas!" he said, speaking incoherently, almost wildly.

"Yes, they used to be hers," Isabel said, thinking only of the despised and injured governess, and inwardly quaking as she wondered what would come next.

"Used to be!" he cried, catching at her words, while his face grew almost convulsed—"used to be! Then she is dead! Ah, me!" and he caught his breath in a hard, dry sob. "This was our engagement ring," he continued, touching it again, tenderly. "How beautiful she was the night I put this upon her finger! There is not a woman here tonight as fair as she was then! And these other gems were her bridal gifts, and I thought to see her wear them when she should have been my wife. But the time never came. That is long ago—ages ago, it seems to me! I thought the memory of it had faded out into but a shadow, but the sight of these things tonight is like the keen edge of a knife in my heart."

His voice had grown infinitely sad. He appeared quite unnerved; his lips quivered, and tears stood in his fine eyes, while he gazed upon that ring, as if he were looking his last upon his dearest friend who was dead.

"Was she your mother?" he at length asked, breaking the spell and looking up at her.

"No, she was not my mother," Isabel answered, guiltily, scarce knowing what to say, and yet strangely moved by his wild, sad words.

"Your aunt, perhaps, then?—she had a brother."

"But—but," he added, with sudden thought, "you are not the one who wore the corals that night at the opera; she was short, and darker than you. Those were my gifts to Meta, and she wore them last on that dreadful night.—Ah! ah! I did not think the pain

LOS ANGELES, 244 EAST 27th ST., CAL.

Mount Low, Over a Mile High

It was with that pleasure of looking forward to treat to come, "A couple of kids once more;" e had made up our minds to, as the slogan says: Mount Lowe—Let's Go". Saint Pluvius had it the damper on for over two weeks and with at grim determination of "I don't care what appens," we, my husband and I went up Mount owe.

We had carefully prepared for this by the fact at we had some ninety-six letters and post cards, er 90 of which were to "COMFORT" sisters in very state of the union, ready to post when we ached the 5000 foot landing, where the Inn and . S. Post Office is situated, each bearing a New ear's Wish.

January 1, we secured tickets at Los Angeles, he familiar strip as long as your arm, which took s through the decorated streets of Pasadena, where he Rose Carnival is held on January 1st, to Altadena, millionaires' colony, through orchard after orchard golden oranges, grapefruit and lemons and many date palm with its load, to Rubio Canyon where he second stage of the journey starts. If half of he peppers we passed, in great scarlet clusters on he trees were turned into pepper, the whole world uld sneeze from now on for the rest of the year. The incline railway is 3000 feet long and rises 00 feet, and up this we went. It was "hold your eath," as we went up, up, and there is even a king path by its side, and how we envied those ho "did the trail" up.

At Echo Mountain, the top of the incline, is tuated the Lowe Observatory and the three illion candle power search-light. Ella Wheeler Vilcox, after looking in the telescope at Lowe Observatory, wrote for Edgar Lucien Larkin, the Director:

"My thoughts walk alone on this mountaintop,
In silence-sandals shod,
What mortal would presume to speak,
When all alone with God."

Another kind of car was waiting to take us five miles over the wildest cuttings in the mountain, or five miles, ever upward, until we reached the 5000 foot level of the Inn and cottages and bungalows, where we were to stay.

The journey to the summit from here, 1100 feet above, is made on the backs of ponies, or one can hike it up in about two hours. The mighty spikes of the Yucca are a glorious sight, but it is left for a great surprise as one turns in the trail to Inspiration Point, for trees appear, in the distance, to be covered in snow, but which are soon found to be the cards of the thousands of people who have visited this spot, called very appropriately, "Proposal Arbor."

It is to laugh, and we did our share while placing our card on a tree with the date, Jan. 1, and reading dozens of young ladies' names and addresses on any old thing that came handy. Some had tied them on around trunks of trees, of pieces of shoe boxes, everything capable of conveying the idea. Then on we trailed to Inspiration Point, and here we saw the truth of the saying: "The cart before the horse", for a short line of railway, very narrow, with one car, like an Irish jaunting car, was running to Picture Rock, a thirty-minute trip, for twenty-five cents and the mule was hitched in the wrong way of the shafts and he "pushed" the concern along. "It's done to save the passengers eating the dust that the mule kicks up", said the driver. How we laughed at what we at first thought was a joke.

Then we went to "Easter Rock" and took a photo of its inscription, where a sunrise service is held every Easter morning. Returning we saw many squirrels, but got by them. My husband said, "They are evidently not hungry," and the crested birds, blue birds, tomtits and several others, so tame, that by holding broken nuts in your open hand they alighted and fed.

The Inn, with its great fireplace of immense logs; rows of large rocking chairs, the band and the cuisine all make one feel at home even if they are 5000 feet or more above the sea level.

Yours in COMFORT service,
MRS. JAMES E. MARSH.

COLUMBIA, S. C.

DEAR SISTERS:

My mother has been taking COMFORT a long time and I have always enjoyed reading it.

I am eighteen years old and have a good husband and a dear little baby girl. I want to send her picture next time.

I have had many exciting things happen to me; it would be hard to tell which was the most and as I think this is, so will tell you about it.

When my husband and I were first married he had just been discharged from the army and had only money enough to take him to his home out West. He tried everywhere for work but times were hard and he was not successful. We kept going on toward his home but in a small town in Alabama our money gave out so I put on my riding suit of khaki trousers and shirt, his army hat and after expressing our baggage we set out on foot. For two days we walked, stayed at a farmhouse one night and in a barn the next. The next morning as we were walking by a station a slow freight train was pulling out. I climbed up a ladder, as it started, calling to my husband to come. It was

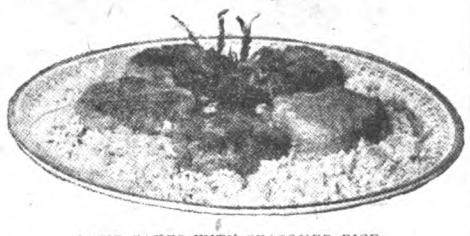
MRS. Arthur Norton, Syracuse, R. R. 2, New York, wins the COMFORT's Sisters' Pin for May with her recipe for everlasting yeast. It should prove a boon to those living a long distance from stores and she has given explicit directions for making it. That is the kind of recipe that wins a prize pin, the kind that the most inexperienced cook can follow.—Ed.

EVERLASTING YEAST.—(Requested.) When I first began making bread I was given a "starter" from one who had received it elsewhere but I failed to use it often enough so had to use fresh yeast. I live four miles from a grocery store and as it was so hard to have fresh yeast when necessary I experimented and have now made at least ten loaves of bread from one-half yeast cake so I know it is no different from the "starter". I make two loaves at a time with the use of a quart can but for the benefit of those with larger families I shall give recipe for four loaves.



Boil potatoes at noon. Put one yeast cake dissolved in one-half cup warm water into two-quart can, add one cup sugar, large teaspoon salt, and fill can with the potato water (just lukewarm not hot), stir thoroughly, and leave until night. Quite late in evening, stir yeast and pour into bread mixer leaving about three inches of yeast in can. If preferred add three tablespoons shortening to yeast ready for bread and thicken with flour until dough will not cling to finger. Let rise over night. Put into tins early in the morning and it is ready to bake at ten o'clock or before.

The yeast to be used as starter again should be sealed tightly and placed in refrigerator or some place equally as cold. After making the starter the recipe is simple.

Open can of yeast, add sugar, salt and potato water, let stand until foam rises high on top. Pour out yeast necessary, add flour and proceed as with any bread.

The reason some yeast "goes back" or becomes useless is from lack of use. Once a week will keep it full of life. Sometimes it is well to add some sugar and potato water and throw out the yeast if no bread is needed.—MRS. ARTHUR NORTON, Syracuse, R. R. 2, New York.

LAMB CAKES WITH SEASONED RICE.—Very slowly fry one tablespoon of thinly sliced onion in three tablespoons of butter and then skim out the onion. Smooth one-fourth cup of dry flour into the butter then slowly add one cup of hot milk while continuously stirring and simmer two minutes. To this mixture add one cup of coarsely chopped cooked lamb and one cup of fresh boiled potato chopped fine. Season with salt and pepper and one teaspoon of tomato catsup. Gently stir and beat until the mixture is blended but do not cook. When cool enough to handle shape into cakes, roll in crumbs, then in lightly beaten egg and water and then in crumbs. Fry in deep fat. Boil rice and thoroughly drain. Toss in one-fourth cup of warmed butter to which two teaspoons of lemon juice have been added.

BAKED HAM.—Wash ham thoroughly in warm water and soak over night. In morning put on to boil in cold water to cover. Boil slowly four or five hours or until tender, allowing about half an hour to the pound. Cool in water in which it was boiled. Remove skin carefully, put h m in pan and cover with one cup of brown sugar and one teaspoon pepper, add two cups of cold water and bake in hot oven forty-five minutes to one hour, baste often. When brown add one cup of cider or one-half cup vinegar and thicken with two tablespoons flour.—MRS. MAMIE WILLIAMS, Ipe, Tenn.

MUSTARD PICKLED SMELTS.—Clean and wash smelts and leave over night in strong salt water. In morning wipe dry and pack into jars. To one gallon of vinegar, add six tablespoons of ground mustard, a little more than level full, three-quarters (scant) teaspoon cayenne pepper, one tablespoon of mace, one and one-half tablespoons of whole cloves and one and one-half tablespoons allspice. Put all the spices together in vinegar and boil three minutes. Pour over fish in jars, to cover, adjust covers and put in boiler, as for ordinary canning. Let boil two and one-quarter to two and one-half hours, seal tight. Fine for winter use.—MRS. FRANK CONLEE, Mosier, Oregon.

HOME-MADE MUSTARD. (Requested.) Mix four tablespoons of sugar with four tablespoons of good ground mustard, beat in one egg until perfectly smooth, then stir in one cup of vinegar, very slowly to prevent curdling. Cook in a double boiler, stirring constantly. After removing from fire add one tablespoon of butter or olive oil and stir until thoroughly mixed. Put in glasses and it is ready for table use.

FILLED SHEET COOKIES.—Cream one cup of sugar with butter the size of a walnut, add two well-beaten eggs and one-half cup of thin cream and stir. Sift one cup of flour with three-fourths teaspoon of salt and two slightly rounded teaspoons of baking powder. Add to the above mixture with one teaspoon of vanilla and beat until smooth, then add flour to roll. Shape into a ball without kneading enough of the dough to cover the baking tin, and roll about one-third of an inch thick. Set the tin on the dough and with a knife mark the size, then cut the dough one inch smaller on the four sides to allow for rising. Spread the dough on the tin which has been well buttered and bake in a quick oven. Do not try to bake in too large a sheet as it is difficult to handle the dough. Put two sheets together with filling between and cut into squares with a sharp thin knife.

FILLING.—Stir into two tablespoons of orange or lemon juice enough sifted powdered sugar to make a stiff frosting. Into this stir chopped raisins or dates and nuts or the three combined. Or, a jelly or thick jam can be used.

AMERICAN CHOP SUEY.—One pound of hamburg steak, three medium-sized onions, one bunch of celery, one tablespoon lard, one tablespoon butter, one box of spaghetti or macaroni, two cans of tomato soup, one teaspoon of salt and one-quarter teaspoon pepper. Chop onions and celery together, not fine but just medium, then add meat, pepper and salt, mix thoroughly; put lard and butter into frying pan, add above mixture and fry twenty minutes stirring often. Have ready one package of macaroni or spaghetti that has been boiled in salted water until tender, drained, chilled and drained again, add meat mixture to this, then the tomato soup and put into baking dish and bake three-quarters of an hour in a moderate oven.—MRS. C. W. ANDERSON, West Minneapolis, 4020 Aldrich Ave., Minn.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Hamilton dies poor, leaving two daughters, Gillian and Jacqueline, to the care of his father's housekeeper, Mr. Marchmont, in league with his butler, housekeeper and Lesard, buys Hamilton Place and is anxious to adopt both girls that he may gain admittance to the neighboring houses. Jacky refuses; finding Gill in tears begs her not to stay if unwilling. Gill admits there was someone in London and he writes he cannot have her for his wife. She refuses to give his name. Three months later and she wonders why Marchmont adopted her and wishes there had not been the burglary at Lord Hollis's. Lesard, in love with Jacky, will care for her. If alone she would marry him, but she must go to Gill, who is unhappy. Lesard warns her not to go—it is no place for any woman; but asks her to trust him. Mrs. Gibbs, the housekeeper, engages a new maid, Mary James, who is Jacky in disguise. Gill confesses her fears that Marchmont is an impostor and cautions Jacky to avoid him, and Jacky knows Lesard is right. Mrs. Gibbs tells Jacky she is to accompany Gill and Mr. Marchmont to Sir Simon Wellford's, where there is to be a grand party. Jacky, that night, spies three men, Marchmont, a stranger and Lesard, and hears from him, "here's luck to the ball." She gets Gill ready for the visit and at Lady Wellford's has a room next to Gill's. Sir Charles Vivian takes Gill into dinner. The ball follows and Gill smuggles Jacky in dressed in a white domino, where she recognizes Lesard in the guise of a monk and fails to make him reveal his identity, leaving her baffled. Following him and Gill in search of Jacky, they see the robbery and rather than make an outcry Gill admits he is her husband. With the guests at supper a robbery is committed. Mrs. Fareham's jewels are missing and only Gillian's jewel case left. Detectives arrive and Sir Charles Vivian's statements, as to his movements before the dinner, relieve him and Gill of suspicion. Jacky reads his last letter to Gill, and while loathing the man whom she believes has wronged both, she knows they are not strong and brave enough. Marchmont insists that Gillian shall appear at dinner and Jacky late in the evening slips down-stairs, opens a door, standing behind it. She recognizes the voices of Lesard and Brookes and the latter calls, "All clear," and she sees Marchmont, Brookes and Lesard who is bringing the jewels, which he carries in his belt, the stones removed by Marchmont and Lesard laying the canvas belt in the place uncovered. Struggling, she gains the passage back, her hands bleeding. Jacky hears Brookes query why Lesard goes out the other way and what will prevent his coming back and taking it. Gillian goes to walk with Sir Charles Vivian and is joined by Jacky. She admits Jacky is her sister. Jacky discovers a flash of light. She has found the other way and someone is coming out from an opening in the wall which is well concealed by ivy and at the foot is a deep dark pool. It is Lesard. Jacky crawls in—the stones are undisturbed. Going out, she hears Gillian call, "Marchmont is back." He has seen the detective. Unless Lesard fails him he is safe. Gill and Jacky decide to get out at once. Jacky means to take the jewels. Lesard decides to have his share and starts for Hamilton Place. Jacky finds the jewels and is staggered by the weight. She fastens the belt around her body. In the collection is a necklace of stones clear and black. She hears someone coming. It is Lesard. Brookes, suspicious of him, goes with Marchmont to the cellar where he meets with an accident. Lesard, unconscious of Marchmont's presence, secures the black diamonds. Marchmont asks what he is doing and finding the belt gone grasps Lesard and feels a package under his shirt. He denies having the belt but something better—the black diamonds. Marchmont declares he has never touched the belt and if Lesard will put the necklace back he will share with him. Lesard attempts to leave. If he moves, Marchmont threatens to kill. There is the sound of a leap and Marchmont is dead. Jacky, kneeling beside him, leaves a bloody print of her left hand. The sisters make their escape in the dark and take the wrong road, finding a deserted hut, where they seek shelter and after resting they keep on to Fulchester and take a train to London. Sir Charles Vivian is told of Marchmont's death by Lady Wellford who is afraid Gillian Hamilton did it and going to Hamilton Place learns that Mrs. Gibbs swears that Gillian murdered Marchmont. During the inquest the jury and coroner visit the secret passage and on the margin of the stream is the bloody imprint of a girl's hand. The jury and witnesses dismissed, Mrs. Gibbs returning to her room sees Lesard, and it is not the man she knows. He claims I am Lesard and will tell that Mary Gibbs is the same person as Mary Gresham as the man now is and yet is not Lesard who stands here.

FAITHFUL IN HIS FASHION."

"NOW," said the man quietly, "tell me what all this means?"

As if his voice broke a spell that was on her, she looked up with sudden boldness.

"You to ask!" she cried. "Oh, you can't take me in with no acting, Lesard, trying to look different and then saying in the next breath that you're yourself! What game are you up to? You know all about the murder. You were here that night—Brookes saw you."

Her old effrontery was coming back to her, though her face was still the color of lead. "You to come here putting on airs and trying to frighten me with old stories, when I could give away ten robberies you've done, let alone your being here that night!"

But something in the man's face frightened her again.

"Look again," he said slowly. "It was not I who was here that night. Did it never come to your knowledge that the Lesard you have the honor to know has a brother?"

"Brother? Not he!" she said, broken with surprise. "There ain't but one Lesard—I can swear to that!"

"Then you'll perjure yourself. There are two, and neither of them are in your power, because one knows too much."

Trembling with rage, she gazed at him and knew he spoke the truth. This Lesard she had never seen before.

"Then your brother was hand in glove with Jim—did all his dirty work," she cried maliginantly; "was hidden in this house the night of the murder!"

If the man's face changed a little she could not see it where he sat, with his back to the window. His voice was perfectly level as he answered:

"That doesn't concern you," he said. "The point is what you know." He took out his watch. "I'll give you ten minutes, after that"—he shrugged his shoulders—"the police can question Mary Gresham—not I."

Mrs. Gibbs sprang to her feet.

"You can go to hell—you and your questions!" she gasped. "If you want to know who killed Marchmont you can find out nearer home than me! What was Lesard doing in this house that night, if it wasn't murder? Where is he now, with the jewels he stole out of the cellar?" she stopped, almost choking in her rage.

The cellar! What did she mean? But whether she told him news or not, she did not know, for he never blanched.

"Where he is is his business—not mine, he returned slowly. "Do you think I came about the murder? It is no concern of mine who killed Marchmont."

Mrs. Gibbs was suddenly motionless where she stood. If it was not to find out that he had come, what had brought him? Her terror of this stranger redoubled. Was he made of iron, that he never winced when she spoke of Lesard? Was he really his brother?

"Four minutes have gone"—he was looking quite carelessly at his watch—"six more—then the police."

"Call them now"—she was panting—"and I'll tell them and you, too, that Lesard—" She stopped short, cowering as from a blow, yet the man had not moved except to lift his eyelids a little. "What do you want to know?" she was suddenly whimpering, edging away from him. "Don't look at me like that! It's no good. I don't know anything you'd like to know, and if I did you can't do anything. He's in it, significantly. "I thought you were him when you came in!"

"But I'm not he!" the man said slowly. "And you may as well know that I can, and will, do anything."

There was something in his voice that would have made her run for protection to the very police down-stairs rather than stay alone with this man whose very presence was a threat; but, bold woman as she was, she dared not stir till he gave her leave.

"I didn't do it," she sobbed; "I swear I didn't. And Lesard was here that night! Brookes saw him."

"It's nothing to me if the whole world saw him," indifferently, "nor if you murdered every thief in London. All I want to know is what you—yes you!"—with sudden lightening in the steely eyes, sudden threatening in the voice that had been so low—"did with Jacky Hamilton. You had better tel me, if you take any interest whatever in the future career of—Mary Gresham!"

"Hush! hush!" she clapped her hands to her ears. "You don't know who might hear you."

"Ah, yes I do!" coolly. "No one can—till I call them. We are in a lonely part of the house, you and I!"

The cold terror of death seemed to fall on her at the significant tone; she tried for words, for something that would satisfy this man who would stick at nothing to gain his ends, and could only falter out a name.

"Jacky—I—there was no Jacky! Her name was Gillian."

"Not Gillian," sharply, "the other! The sister who came down afterward What did you do to those two girls to make them go out into the dark that night, rather than stay another hour in this house?"

"Nothing," said the woman slowly, and some of the terror that possessed her seemed to have fled. "I did nothing. And if you've any sense you won't ask me another question about those girls—if you care for them."

"That's my business. Go on!" he leaned against the mantelpiece and lit a cigarette, apparently as cool as the woman opposite was flurried. But as she spoke he forgot the lighted match between his fingers, and held it until it scorched his hard skin yellow, and then brown.

"That girl—that came down"—in spite of her fright she took a pleasure in telling him—"didn't come as any visitor. She came here as Miss Hamilton's maid. And she brought testimonials from—well, it don't matter! But, anyhow, I took her because she was one of the gang. She did her work well, and I wouldn't split on her now if"—her face worked well, a dreadful mingling of sorrow and spite—"she hadn't gone off like that, when her sister, or she, killed Marchmont!"

The black end of the burned-out match fell from the man's fingers, sounding loud in the utter stillness. For a minute his face was as evil as that of the other Lesard, but it cleared as he drew a quick, scornful breath.

"Five minutes ago," he said, and if his face was scornful, his eyes were devilish, "you said it was my brother who killed Marchmont! I don't believe it was either he or two slips of girls. Mary Gresham, who is wanted for manslaughter, is, it seems to me, wanted now for murder!"

The woman flung out her hands in desperation, in grief that had a certain dignity because it was real.

"Believe what you like," she cried, "but not that, for it is not true. I loved him this many a year. In my way I was faithful to him where many another woman would have betrayed him. No one knows better than you that he didn't always treat me fair. But I'd go to my grave this minute a happy woman if I could but hear him speak once more, even if it was to swear at me. What I said about Lesard I said to try and frighten you; I don't believe he had any hand in it, though it is God's truth that he was here that night and that some one—either he or they—took away all the jewels. But that's neither here nor there, for whoever did it, it will come out; it always does. But it wasn't he that murdered Marchmont!"

"Go on!" he said again, as she stopped for breath. But she saw that his cigarette was as dead as the match that had scorched through the skin of his finger.

"The girl came down a month ago, as I said, Jacky, as you called her, Mary James she called herself—a pale chit of a thing, with smooth, red hair—what! wasn't that the girl you meant?"

For the man had unmistakably started.

"Red or yellow, what does it matter?" he had recovered himself impatiently, but he was utterly at a loss. Jacky Hamilton—his Jacky—had had hair like burned gold, waving and curling like fine gold wire, a very glory to her small head. And pale—Jacky's cheek was like a peach in the sun. Who was this that had passed herself off as Jacky Hamilton, and where was the real Jacky now?

"There was no yellow about it," Mrs. Gibbs said flatly. "Just a good plain red. And her face was like chalk. She was no fool, either, for she brought those recommendations that showed she was 'in the know' just as calm as if they were real references. I trusted her"—she winced to think how much—"and all the time she must have been lying low to get a chance at those jewels—or, perhaps, at him. I don't know," wearily. "But she wasn't clever enough at the end."

"Never mind that!" The man's sharp words would have been a cry of agony from a woman. "Was the girl Gillian Hamilton's sister?"

Either way the answer would hurt him, and his lips shut in a hard line to endure it.

"Gillian said so. That beast of a Vivian knows all about it; he told it at the inquest. But sister or not," venomously, "she was a devil, a red-haired, lying devil! And it was she started all the mischief in this house. She knew everything; she let in Lesard and—" the woman stopped short. What had she been thinking of all this time to talk to this man about the stolen jewels! In her fright for her own safety, her certainty that he knew all about everything, she had forgotten that it was one thing to guess the household had lived by thieving, another to be told it outright. Marchmont was dead, but she wanted him to go to his grave like a gentleman, with half the county at his funeral.

"You needn't pull yourself up," he said contemptuously. "I know who was at the bottom of the very first burglary in this neighborhood. All I want to know is why you [illegible] those girls killed Marchmont?"

For the first time Mrs. Gibbs looked [illegible] the eyes, and what she saw there [illegible] tongue. Alone with him, in a strut[illegible] of the house, she dared not be the one [illegible] him.

"Go down," she said, "ask your [illegible] Richardson, the detective, what he found [illegible] the cellar. And then wonder, if you like, [illegible] I said that girl with the smooth, red hair [illegible] devil. And tell, if you like, that I am [illegible] Gresham, that Marchmont was Jim Adams [illegible] burglar—and I will tell"—she got up and [illegible] him like a wild beast at bay—"that your [illegible] brother is a burglar and worse; that [illegible] you thought Jim and me, we were [illegible] side by side with Lesard, that's a friend [illegible] hell!"

"I will tell nothing while you can be [illegible] to me," said the man slowly. His face [illegible] pale under his dark skin, but somehow she [illegible] knew it was not fear for his brother's sake [illegible] that took the good blood from his cheek [illegible] some other thought that she could not fathom [illegible]

"But if you say one other evil thing about Jacqueline Hamilton, I will tell—[illegible] brother—everything I know about you to the police. Stay here, and hold your tongue till I come back. And remember that whatever lie you tell about those girls brings you nearer to prison for life. And neither you nor the butler are to leave this house till I find out the truth. You understand?"

He was gone, with his long, noiseless [illegible] almost as he spoke, but though it was [illegible] that passed, he did not come back again.

Mrs. Gibbs looked up as the room began [illegible] grow dark, and laughed where she sat. [illegible] strange enemy had got more down-stairs [illegible] he bargained for!

"He may tell me he isn't Lesard over [illegible] over," she said to herself. "But till that's [illegible] proved, black and white, I don't know [illegible] one Lesard. And so I'll swear, no matter [illegible] what they do to me. My gentleman [illegible] find himself in a wasp's nest before he's [illegible] with me!"

She would have been more triumphant [illegible] could she have seen the man in his thoughts.

Richardson had taken him into that [illegible] cave below the cellar, and after one glance [illegible] had hurried out again into the open air. [illegible] Richardson had spoken as he followed [illegible]

"You were wrong, you see, Mr. Lesard. I'll have to get a warrant out for those girls," he observed, as carelessly as if they had been two kittens he must drown.

And now as Lesard sat waiting to take [illegible] train to London, dark lines grew beneath [illegible] eyes. Jacky Hamilton's conduct in this house, Jacky Hamilton's face bleach—for Richardson had spared him nothing—had been all of a piece. If she had been on the side of right and honesty, why had she never written to the man who could have swept every trouble from her path as the wind sweeps straws?

And the madness of it appalled him.

How had she come by those testimonials? And where was she now that she thought to get away safely with that mute and awful witness of crime printed in blood for all the world to see? How had she ever come to such a pass when all she had to do was to telegraph one word to him and be free of Marchmont forever?

The man flung back his head like a horse stung by a poisonous fly.

Jacky Hamilton might be a thief, a murderess, anything! But he loved her—loved her even while he hated her for what he could not understand.

Louis Lesard, who was for his sins cursed with a brother who was his double, [illegible] everything except that it was Jacky Hamilton who must have done this thing—and that she hanged even women for murder!

Dark, lean, sinewy, he stretched himself in his chair as a man does who means to try [illegible] strength against fearful odds.

What was it Gibbs had said? That [illegible] way she had been faithful to Jim Adams, who had not always treated her fair.

After all, what did he know? Not even [illegible] himself would he allow that the eyes of love could not be mistaken in the prints of the little fingers that had worn his ring.

And let her be true or untrue, he would [illegible]

A NOVEL WAY OF SHAPING COOKIES.

By Violet Marsh

HAVE always wondered how busy mothers found time to roll and cut cookies for the children because they disappear so rapidly that to keep the jar filled they have to be made frequently. For this reason, dough rolled into thin sheets, baked, and into squares while hot seemed the best ution, for children must have cookies to be opy. But now I am passing along a new k which I saw done by a professional baker o each day put trays of good-looking oat- al cookies into his window. Instead of roll- the dough, small balls were quickly shaped ween the ds and ced well rt in tins. n each ll was ssed flat th the m of the nd. As ractice ke's per- t," the er would h time, e up the ct amount lough, one ssure of e palm ught the gh to the quired ickness l, when baked, the cookies had a uniform pearance.

Other cookies of a smoother texture were de into balls and then evenly pressed into rounds with the bottom of a drinking bler lightly oiled. This made a small kie, but any round and flat surface that is er could be used, such as a pint dipper. okies made in this way are much nicer ause they are handled with less flour.

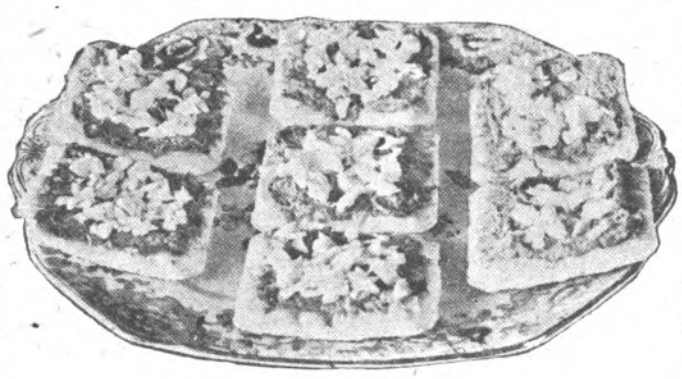
e Eggs When They Are Plentiful. An Excellent Food for Children

n spring and early summer, when eggs are utiful and cheap, the thrifty among the sekeepers utilize plenty of them in prepar- the "hearty" dishes as well as by putting m into a variety of desserts.

Besides the daily use of eggs at this season, y should be procured in quantities and served for winter use while they can be had a reasonable price. Sodium ate, or water-glass, is the st convenient preservative which to store eggs for winter but where lime is easily curable, lime water is very isfactory d much aper than er-glass. e water is to roughen shells of eggs slight- making the s somewhat s attractive appearance an water- ss eggs.

To preserve h lime, dis- lve two nds of un- cked lime in small quan- y of water, l dilute with e gallons of ter that has viously been boiled and cooled. Allow the xture to stand until the lime settles, then m off, and use the clear liquid.

Water-glass may be purchased at grocery or ig stores. In putting down eggs use thor- ghly sterilized earthenware, enamelware, glass. A five-gallon jar will hold fifteen zen eggs in ten quarts of liquid. Pour one asure of water-glass into the jar, and add e measures of water that has been boiled enty minutes and cooled. Stir well.



The eggs must be fresh and clean, but never shed, as washing removes a necessary coat- g of the egg. Put a few at a time into the lution, using a long-handled ladle to pre- nt any jar ming to the gs, or the ells to crack, e solution ould always at least two ches over e tops of the gs. Keep vered in a ark cool ace.

Before boil- g preserved gs, make a ay hole in ch end to prevent bursting.

In serving eggs plentifully it must be remem- ered they are concentrated food, supplying o roughage to fill the stomach. Children ed eggs, and their use makes cooking easy ecause they can be combined with starch, ilk, fruits and vegetables. Following are me well-balanced egg dishes.

EGGS SCRAMBLED WITH TOMATOES.—To one and a half cups of thick canned tomatoes, add one-third teaspoon of salt and a little pepper. Cook about ten minutes. Slightly beat six eggs. Have ready a warm iron frying pan with three tablespoons of melted butter in it, then add the tomatoes and lastly the eggs. Set over a slow heat and gently stir until the mixture has thickened to a creamy consistency. Serve on slices of toast or with baked potatoes.

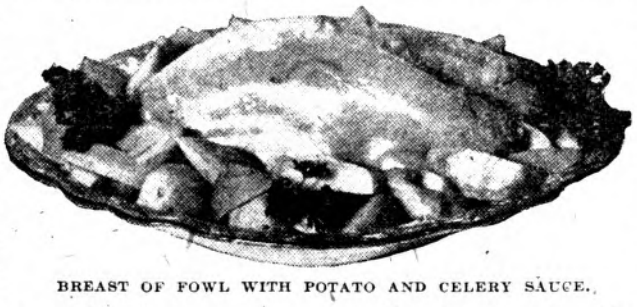
EGGS COOKED IN CREAM.—Into a small sauce pan pour one-half cup of thin cream. Set into a dish of boiling water, and when hot drop into the cream two or three eggs that have been carefully broken into a saucer. When the eggs are cooked, dish onto slices of buttered toast and pour over the cream. It is well to add a little salt to the cream while it heats.

BEAN RABBIT.

EGGS WITH MASHED POTATO.—In a buttered frying pan spread left-over mashed potato about three-fourths of an inch thick and slowly fry on one side to a golden brown. In another pan cook the eggs, allowing one-half teaspoon of butter and two teaspoons of milk to each egg. Put the butter into the pan, then the egg and milk slightly beaten together. Cook over a quick fire while continuously stirring from the bottom. When a jellied consistency is reached, spread over the potato, fold once and turn onto a platter.

SCRAMBLED EGGS WITH BREAD.—Fry just enough bacon to give the desired amount of fat and remove bacon to a platter. In the fat, brown small cubes of stale bread, then drop in the desired number of unbeaten eggs and stir until the eggs are cooked. Serve with hot corn bread. Left-over rice or macaroni may be used in the same way.

OMELET.—Set the omelet pan where the butter will just melt, using just enough to cover the pan. Beat eggs until very light and add one tablespoon of hot water for each egg and season with salt. Pour the mixture into the frying pan and increase the heat somewhat. Slide a knife under the edge and when the omelet becomes brown set the pan in a slow oven to cook and dry off the top. Cut once through the center, fold one-half over the other and slide onto platter.



SALT-RISING BREAD.

A little grated cheese sprinkled over the top of the omelet before it is put into the oven makes a cheese omelet.

Finely chopped cooked ham may be beaten into the eggs, or it may be sprinkled over the top on putting into the oven.

Any kind of left-over vegetables may be heated and folded into an omelet, thus making it a more important dish.

CHINESE OMELET WITH SALMON.—Fry three tablespoons of minced onion and two chopped green peppers, with seeds removed, in two or three tablespoons of salad oil until tender. Beat three eggs until light, then add one cup of cooked rice and one cup of minced salmon. Mix well, add salt and pepper and spread over the fried vegetables. Have only a moderate heat and keep lifting with a knife until the omelet is lightly browned, then set in slow oven to finish. In cooking the onion and pepper, care must be taken not to brown the oil.

BREAST OF FOWL WITH POTATO AND CELERY SAUCE.

ANGEL FOOD CAKE.—Beat whites of nine eggs until frothy, add one level teaspoon of cream of tartar and continue beating until stiff and dry. Gradually beat in one cup of sugar. Measure three-fourths cup of flour after sifting; add one-fourth teaspoon of salt and sift five times. Add one-half teaspoon of vanilla to egg, then fold in the flour. Bake in a funnel-tin forty-five minutes.

CHILDREN'S SUPPER DISH.—Beat three eggs with three cups of milk one-eighth teaspoon of salt and two tablespoons of sugar. Into this mixture dip six slices of stale bread cut about one inch thick. Lay the slices in a well-buttered biscuit pan a little apart and then pour over all the remaining mixture. Bake until the toast begins to brown in a moderately hot oven. If cinnamon flavor is desired a little can be added to the custard mixture.

Good Old-Fashioned Loaf

To many persons no bread can equal the "salt-rising" variety; the kind their grandmothers made. This bread, the name of which is somewhat misleading, has been known in one form or another for generations. It has been a particular favorite when and where satisfactory yeast was difficult to obtain.

To make: Scald one cup of milk, and let cool until lukewarm, then add one tablespoon of butter, one teaspoon of salt, two tablespoons of white corn meal and one tablespoon of sugar. Mix smooth and place in a glass fruit can, or crock, and set in a pan of water as hot as the hand can conveniently be held in it. Keep in a warm place six or seven hours, or until it shows signs of fermentation, but do not increase the temperature of the water. As soon as the gas can be heard as it escapes the mixture has fermented sufficiently. This amount of leaven contains enough liquid for one loaf. By adding one cup of warm milk, one teaspoon of salt, one tablespoon of sugar and one of butter, two loaves can be made. Make a soft sponge by adding one cup of flour for each loaf. Beat thoroughly, cover closely and set in a warm place. When it is very light, add more flour gradually until the dough is so stiff that it can be kneaded without sticking to the hands or to the board. Cut and knead until very smooth and put at once into pans, allowing it to rise until about two and one-half times its original bulk, and bake. This bread is never quite so spongy as that made with yeast. The addition of dates makes a delicious loaf. Peel, remove pits, and cut dates into several pieces lengthwise. Add them gradually by working into the dough during the latter part of the kneading.

General Recipes

BREAST OF FOWL WITH POTATO AND CELERY SAUCE.—Clean and tie fowl as for roasting, but do not stuff. Tie into a thin piece of white muslin or cheese-cloth. Place in a steamer and cook until very tender, which will take several hours. Cut the breast out whole, place on a hot platter and pour over a sauce made as follows; Two cups of celery cut very fine and boiled until tender. Drain and press through a potato ricer or sieve, saving the water the celery is cooked in. Add enough rich milk to the water to make two cupfuls. Melt four tablespoons of butter, smooth in three tablespoons of dry flour and slowly add the liquid. Season with salt, a little paprika, and add the celery. Cook five minutes.

Prepare the potatoes by paring and cutting into several pieces and soaking one hour in salted cold water. Drain. Melt a piece of butter the size of a walnut in a frying pan, put in the potatoes sprinkled lightly with salt, and add a little melted butter over the top. Place in a moderate oven and bake until very soft, turning occasionally until they have cooked enough to begin to brown.

The remainder of the fowl may be cut into pieces and with the bones cooked very slowly until the meat leaves the bones. Do not use too much water. It may then be made into a fricassee or stew with dumplings.

BOILED LEG OF MUTTON WITH CAPER SAUCE.—Remove the outer skin from mutton, scrape and wipe cut surfaces. Place in a kettle large enough for them to lie flat, and barely cover with boiling water. Quickly bring to a boil, cook hard about eight minutes and skim. Set the kettle back where it will just simmer until the meat is tender. When half done add one level tablespoon of salt.

SAUCE.—Slowly brown one-half cup of butter and gradually beat it into a mixture of two tablespoons each of vinegar, lemon juice and Worcester Sauce, and one level tablespoon of salt, and one-third teaspoon of salt.

RAGOUT OF POTATOES AND LEFT-OVER MEAT.—Fry two sliced onions in two tablespoons of nice beef fat until they are a light brown. Add one slightly rounded tablespoon of dry flour and when well blended gradually add two cups of water in which vegetables have been cooked or meat stock. Season and cook five minutes. Now add about three cups of coarsely cut raw potato and simmer until partly done with pan closely covered. Shake occasionally, to prevent sticking. Add one and one-half cups of coarsely cut chicken, and one-half cup of chopped boiled ham. Simmer until potatoes are soft.

CANNED BAKED BEANS FOR SUMMER.—This is the time of year to bake an extra quantity of beans and can part of them for the warm days when we use as little fire as possible. Always can them freshly baked; not after being warmed over. Fill jars, partly seal, set into hot water about two-thirds way up the side of jar, cover closely and cook two hours. Seal. This arrangement should apply to other foods, such as stews, pea soup, macaroni and cheese, or any of the dishes that are a meal in themselves. It is well to cook these foods in the jars longer than fruits.

FISH CHOWDER.—Haddock is the best fish for a chowder. Use a whole fish weighing three and a half to four pounds. Skin. Cut off the head and tail, split and remove the backbone. Cut the fish into three-inch pieces and set aside. Cut up the head and tail, break the backbone into pieces, cover with three cups of cold water and simmer about half an hour. Strain. Cut a slice of salt pork into small pieces and slowly try out. Remove the pork. In the fat fry one sliced onion, add five medium-size potatoes cut into cubes, add one cup of boiling water, set back and very slowly cook until the potatoes are tender. They should practically steam-cook with the pan closely covered. Add water the fish bones were cooked in, then the fish, cover and simmer between ten and fifteen minutes after it begins to boil. Have six common crackers split and soaking in cold milk. Add about one quart of hot milk to the chowder and season. Add the soaked crackers and bring to a boil. Do not cook after milk is added. Unless milk is rich, add about one-third cup of butter.

BEAN RABBIT.—Melt two tablespoons of butter, add one-half teaspoon of salt, one-eighth teaspoon paprika, one-eighth cup of milk and one cup of cold mashed beans. Stir until it begins to cook, then add one-fourth cup of grated cheese. Stir, and when the cheese is melted, serve on toasted buttered crackers. Half a teaspoon of French mustard may be added.

DATE TORTE.—Beat four eggs separately, the whites stiff and dry and the yolks to a pale yellow. Gradually add one cup of granulated sugar to the whites while continuously beating then beat in the yolks. Add one cup of very fine soft bread-crumbs, one cup of dates cut into small pieces, one-half cup of chopped walnuts, and one teaspoonful of vanilla. Bake thirty to forty minutes in a slow oven. Serve with slightly sweetened and flavored whipped cream.

glorious fun to ride for our feet were sore, and so we began our travels as "Knights of the Road." Once we rode 250 miles on a fast freight through the Ozark Mountains We were on the coal tender and when the engine roared around a curve we held on to each other while lumps of coal rattled on our heads But we were so tired that we went to sleep and the fireman had to wake us up when he filled the water tank. Everyone was good to us. The trainmen wouldn't put us off, only once a hard-hearted old conductor chased us off three times but every time we would wait until the train started then we'd climb back on. The last time he chased us over the tops of box cars and caught us and told us if we had to ride to get on a flat car and not break our necks running Once an air hose broke and the train stopped so suddenly that we shot halfway across the empty coal car in which e were riding And again the engine went off the track.

Many people have never seen a woman riding a "rattler" but out in Kansas I saw a woman with her husband and two-year-old son boarding a freight. The woman got on first, he handed her the baby and then ran lightly along and swung himself on. We had all kinds of adventures and in Memphis, Tenn., we were arrested by a special agent of the Frisco Railroad. They let us go but a reporter for the story and our pictures decorated the front page of one of the newspapers, along with the story of the "Hobo Honeymooners."

My mother was badly shocked when we came back, after traveling over four thousand miles without a cent. She thought it was terrible, she is a hard-shelled Presbyterian, but it was a lot of fun to us two young things. I was sixteen then and my husband was twenty-three.

If anyone who reads this, remembers seeing us please write to me. I'd like to get letters from the sisters.

Love and best wishes to all,
MRS. GUY S. MEDLEY

Mrs. Medley.—I don't blame your mother for being horrified, and I'm not a hard-shelled anything either. Think of the danger you were in, but it must have been fun —Ed.

AKRON, 180 W. EXCHANGE ST., O.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT FAMILY:

Let us, my sister and I, give you a description of a little vacation trip we had to Pennsylvania. We were born in that state and have a father and three sisters living there in Woodland, that is, out in the country about three and four miles. Woodland is a small town. I do not know the population. It consists of two brickyards, coal and clay mines, two railroad stations, a few grocery and general merchandise stores and a small park called Mineral Springs, after the mineral water that is in it. We were in the country most of the time so that is what I will talk about. We certainly enjoyed the fresh milk and butter and I guess our sisters knew that by the way the butter and cream disappeared. My sister that was with me has three children and I have two so we were a good-sized family ourselves. The kiddies enjoyed bathing in the brooks. My little girl saw a cricket and said, "Oh, look at the little frog"

We went to the hills, among the rocks, looking for snakes. There is one large rock, called the Snake Den, for the snakes are numerous there. My brother, and some other boys, once used explosives and split it in half. Some large rattlers have been killed there. We donned khaki outfits, blouse and trousers with leggings, and took our cameras with us and sallied forth one red hot day and ended up by being tired to death but with not a snake on our hook. It must have been too hot for them. But while we were tramping the rocks looking for them, a three-foot copperhead was waiting patiently near the house for someone, we never will know just who, for my cousin came along and put an end to his career with a club.

Please, Mrs. Wilkinson, if you are acquainted with Mrs. Lena B. Ellingwood, tell her I am sorry but she will not be able to write any more about Wollie Woodchuck unless it is concerning his death for my brother-in-law set a cruel trap and caught him. We had him for supper. Shiny Black Crow is well and happy at my sister's home where he steals a young chicken when he gets a chance, and the boys catch minnows from the brook for him Yet, he was not satisfied with such good treatment and pecked my little girl's big toe and made it bleed. She doesn't have any use for him now. However, he is quite clever. When he is not hungry he hides any food he finds under chips or bits of paper

My husband is a very good housekeeper, he kept everything looking neat and clean while I was away and took good care of my flowers, and had a most wonderful surprise for me when I came home—a player piano. I told him I would go away often

I received my COMFORT Sisters' Pin and am pleased with it.

I am enclosing a snapshot and hope you can have it printed.

We don't think this is much of a story but, if it is printed it will let people know that two kids of twenty-eight and twenty-five had a most wonderful time.

We would like to receive cards, both of us. Sister is Mrs. M. Spence, 1584 Hampton Road, Akron, Ohio, and my address is at the beginning of this letter.

MRS. P. RAWLING.

Tell me, Mrs. Rawling, why, when there are so many nice things to take pictures of, why did you want to get a picture of a snake? Horrid things. Sorry, but snapshots won't reproduce well, so I appropriated the one you sent for my own personal album. I've lots of good sisters in it already and room for more.—Ed.

P. NIKSICH, MONTENEGRO, EUROPE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT for over six years but this will be my first letter although I have wanted to write before, and as you all seem to like to hear of the travels of the different sisters, I will tell you about my trip which is a little different from any of the trips that have been described.

We, my husband and three children, a girl of five, a boy of three and a baby boy of one year, left California on the first train held up in the R. R. strike out on the desert. Finally we reached New York and there took the steamer, President Wilson, and went to Boston where we took on people and freight. We went second class as most do. The water was smooth, but we got seasick just the same for a day or two. We sailed August 22, on the 28th stopped at Flores, Azores Island. The passengers were taken ashore in little rowboats, as our boat was too large to land. There they had beautiful drawnwork for sale, as well as fruits of all kinds, monkeys and parrots. We went through the Gibralter straights at two o'clock in the morning, passing land a number of times after going through. Next we landed at Algeria, Africa. It is a French town. Nearly all the boats stop there for coal which is carried on men's heads in big baskets. There was fruit and fancy work for sale. Naples, Italy, was the next stop. The beggars came out by the dozens, and on board like large rats looking for stuff to steal. There were all kinds of things for sale and cheap as in other places. Piralus, Greece, was our next stop, Sept. 5th. There we bought the biggest and sweetest grapes I ever tasted, better than in California. Also a kind of candy,

Cubby Bear and the Orioles

By Lena B. Ellingwo

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

MAMMA Bruin was hurrying about, closing the doors and windows of her little house.

"I fear a big storm is coming!" she said. "The wind is growing louder! Hark to the sound of its roaring in the tree-tops!"

"Oh, I am sorry!" said Cubby Bear. "Wollie Woodchuck brought me a message today from Kiddie Goat and Little Lambkin. They want me to go to the pasture with them, and I promised to go tomorrow. I have not seen them for a long time, and I like them both."

The summer day had been fine, but with the coming of evening, a sudden wind had sprung up, blowing great, billowy clouds across the sky.

Soon the sound of the wind was mingled with that of pouring rain. Cubby lay in his little bed, warm and dry, listening to the storm until he fell asleep.

"I am afraid I cannot visit my little playmates today!" was his first thought in the morning, but when he opened his eyes, he saw the sun shining.

He started early for the pasture, going along wet forest paths and beneath dripping trees. Here and there on the ground he saw branches which had been broken from trees by the storm, and in one place a dead pine tree had fallen and lay across his path.

When Cubby reached the pasture, he saw Kiddie Goat and Lillie Lambkin at the farther end, standing by a maple tree, and with them were Wollie Woodchuck, Racky Coon, Billy Bluejay and others. Kiddie Goat came running to meet him.

"Oh, come!" cried Kiddie, "and see what the storm did last night."

Together they hurried to the maple tree. A large branch had been broken nearly off, and was bending downward, nearly touching the ground. And hanging to the branch, swaying in the cool breeze which followed the storm, was an Oriole's nest.

Mr. and Mrs. Oriole were fluttering about, keeping up a plaintive twitter.

"There are baby Orioles inside," explained Kiddie Goat, "and the Orioles are afraid the branch will break off entirely, and fall to the ground."

The baby Orioles were certainly in a dangerous position. Anyone could see that at a glance.

"I never saw a bird's nest like that one!" exclaimed Cubby Bear. "It looks like a deep pocket hung on a branch."

"Orioles always build their nests like that," said Kiddie.

Lillie Lambkin was weeping.

"Oh, the poor, dear little things!" she mourned. "I want them to live, and grow up, to sing their sweet songs, and be happy."

There were pitiful little calls from inside the nest, and Father Oriole carefully fed the hungry babies with worms which Robbie Reddie had kindly brought.

"What can be done to help them?" asked Cubby.

"Nothing—nothing!" answered Kiddie Goat sadly.

"The Beavers are large and strong, and do wonderful things with trees," said Cubby. "I will go for them, and see if they can do anything about it."

He started off, but Redtop Woodpecker stopped him.

"I can go in half the time it would take you," said Redtop.

The minutes passed slowly while he was gone, but it was really only a short time before his red crest was seen coming over the blackberry bushes at the edge of the pasture.

"They are coming," he told them. "Busy Beaver and Brother Binney Beaver. They are bringing some long, slender sticks to use for splints, to hold the broken branch in place, if it can be done."

Mr. Oriole, in a fever of impatience, darted back and forth between the woods and his little nest, and called out at last, "I see them! They are nearly here."

They all began talking at once, explaining to the Beavers what had happened.

"If you want any help from me," said Brother Binney, "be quiet, so that I may look things over, and think."

After a few moments he told them gravely: "The branch seems to be broken nearly off—probably done in the storm last night."

"Yes, yes, yes, we know that!" they told him. And little Mrs. Oriole muttered to her husband: "Much help we shall get from that great, stupid creature!"

"The wind is blowing," went on Binney, "and the danger lies in the fact that the branch may be blown wholly off."

"Yes, yes! but what we want to know is, can anything be done about it?"

"I am coming to that," said Binney, taking off his beaver hat and wiping his brow with his handkerchief. "Now, if we should unfasten the nest carefully from the branch, and hold it in place under another branch, could you Orioles fasten it on so it would stay? Of course you fastened it here, to this broken branch—could you do it again?"

"Oh, no, no!" said the Orioles. "We began, you see, at the top, and built downward. And, beside, our babies are so tiny and so delicate, handling the nest might hurt them. We would not dare to have it done."

"Then we must straighten the branch and fasten it up in place," said Brother Binney Beaver. "It will mean hard work. All must help who can. Fly around, you who have wings, and see if you can find two or three small logs in the pasture or near by in the woods. We brought some sticks to use for splints, and we must have strong vines to twist around the branch and hold the splints in place."

"I know of something better than that," offered Kiddie Goat. "There is a real rope hanging over the pasture fence, near the bars; I saw it this morning. Let me run and get it."

Two small logs were found lying beside the road, which the Beavers thought might be used. But they were dangerously near the farmhouse, in plain sight of the front window, that was large enough to lift them w... venture so near?

COMFORT'S League of Cousins

LEAGUE RULES: To be a comfort to one's parents. To protect the weak and aged. To be kind to dumb animals. To love our country and protect its flag.

CONDUCTED BY UNCLE LISHA

COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 55 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome. ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

"GOSH, Uncle Lisha," Bill exclaimed yesterday morning, crunching his muffin and regarding the spring sunshine approvingly as it brightened the gilt band on his cocoa cup, "do you know you are getting to be awfully serious lately? These talks you are giving the Cousins will make 'em think you are an out-and-out preacher. I don't believe the kids like to read such sober stuff."

"I haven't heard any of them kick yet, Bill," I replied. "There's plenty of brains in our Bunch, and owners that know how to use 'em; I can tell that from the letters I get. Of course I know I like to preach—Uncle Charlie told me that many times—bless him! but don't I preach true things, Bill? That's the main point. I hope I do."

"Well, Uncle Lisha," answered Billy, scenting an argument and pushing his game leg into a sunnier place on the rug, "there are all sorts of truth—everyone has a brand of his own and stands up for it. How do you know the folks are wrong whom you light on so? just because their ideas are not like yours."

"Bill," I said, "of course there are all kinds of beliefs, old and new; but it is pretty certain that the more involved the assertion of Truth, the surer the belief is to be a broken falsity. The Truth I want to preach about—if you call it preaching—is a Truth so simple that a child can understand it. It is a Truth so inclusive that it must be as widespread as man himself. Although men may believe differently because they have been taught differently, yet Truth itself must be something that can be common to all human souls. For these souls have actually no variation in essential quality. They only vary in a recognition of what Truth is—and the more they learn of false, complex and finite things and cling to these, the less will be their power to grasp that which is infinite, unvarying and simple.

I believe that most of the truths men hold to and grant a form of lip and creed and book worship today, Bill, leave them but unhappy infidels and sceptics. Often their daily doubts only gather together into a transient faith at the ringing of a bell, or are solidified to more unfaith by the chaptered guesses expressed in print by some new doubter. But so certain and great are the truths—the Truth—that underlies man's life, that in the midst of his doubts and forgettings he instinctively feels the strength of a hidden Something that can support the heavens as a perfect column. He is brushed by some reflection from a cloud of forgotten glory. He feels that a firm ground, some eternal foundation exists, yet he dares not trust to it. He goes treading timidly on the surface of his quaking material world, skipping about and trying unhappily to find some firm place here and there. He has been taught that the more cleverly he dodges and dances the better he may succeed. But in the end he tiredly collapses, and the music he has danced to he finds was but a brief discord and no eternal harmony.

But before any perfect belief in underlying Truth can come, Bill, we have got to learn to be true to ourselves. Before all else what the world waits for now is truth in human affairs—nothing greater or less than simple honest dealing between man and man. Why should this seem so impossible a dream? Why should it not be easiset and best to deal truthfully with our fellow-men? Are we to fear that the doing of Right will bring forth wrong and end in evil results for those who put their faith in fair and simple dealing? Are we to think that we find strength by avoidance of sincerity? Do we prefer a life lived in the uneasy weakness of concealment and shiftiness? No, Bill; I don't want to think all this. It is not the Truth, I believe.

Look at the lack of truth, for instance, which has existed and continues to exist in European relationships. Watch the hidden undercurrents of purpose and advantage, the secret treaties, the disguised aims, the perpetuated falsities and untruths of action that always bind men and never set them free; the dark paths that lead to more stumbling and never to safe progress in the light. As long as these conditions are left to work their evil there can be no firm ground in Europe. What needs to come to power is the underlying existent Truth in the souls of the masses of men, now smothered by traditions of national policies, by races for wealth and power, and by the governmental jockeyings of diplomatic deceit. It must all crumble and be replaced by another foundation of action, or there can come but a false crying of "Peace, peace" where there is not and cannot be any true or enduring peace.

All the varied ills of our social body could be cured by a treatment of truth, Bill,—by a large dosage of the Universal Truth that mankind is one because God is one, and that the welfare of all must be the aim of all. Every false teaching is a teaching of separation between man and man, and all evil is but the separation of man from Truth—from God. Few men are able to detach themselves from their own false and personal interests sufficiently to regard Truth with the strong and impersonal gaze that is needed to look upon such shining seeing; but that is what we must all learn to do Bill, and when we have seen aright, we will be able to act rightly. If I can teach and preach a little about the direction in which men should look, I will have at least helped them this much toward having eyes that see and ears that hear the Truth. That's what I want to do."

"Well, Uncle Lisha," said Bill, stretching himself more luxuriously in the sun and brushing some crumbs of buttered muffin from his whiskers, "that all sounds good and I believe the Cousins know you mean well. I don't see why it shouldn't be simple and easy to believe that God is Truth and that to work with Him in His way is best for all of us. I notice that God always brings back the spring about on time and does not vary it in quality or change it in price according to good or bad times, wars or tariffs. Yes siree, Uncle, God gives us a square deal, and we ought to learn to deserve it and act as He acts." And saying this, Bill closed his eyes, spreading a shady Michigan letter over them to keep out the sun. I took this for a hint he thought any conversation—or preaching—should cease, and I left him on the rug and went back to my desk. Bill is not a bad sport—he's only like many of us in keeping the least true side of himself too much on exhibition.

And now for the letters:

DANVILLE, 775 GROVE STREET, VA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I am taking another chance in writing, fervently trusting that this one will be fortunate enough to get by, although I couldn't blame you much for not publishing my other one.

I am a new member of the League and enjoy all the letters very much. When I read the vivid descriptions written by some of the cousins about their home places and states, I wish that they could know about "Ole Virginny"—especially Pittsylvania county and Danville. Danville is the last capital of the Confederacy and is a live city of about 25,000 inhabitants. Its chief industry is the handling of leaf tobacco, although the city has some of the largest cotton mills in the south. Our slogan is: "Danville Does Things".

So far and nothing about myself, though that's not so important. I am about five feet, nine inches tall, and I weigh 140 pounds. I have black hair and dark brown eyes. My eyebrows meet, which they say is the sign of wit, and I have a streak of gray in my hair. If you will pardon me for saying so and not judge me too harshly, I'll tell you I part my hair in the middle and wear sideburns—not as long as the ones in the pictures of old relics, found and treasured in every home as the likeness of some famous ancestor. I graduated from high school last year, and since that time I have been employed in an office. We have a fine school and the class of '22 was the finest in the school's history—if I do say it myself. There were about seventy of us in the graduating class, and I wish you could have seen us in our caps and gowns and heard us yelling our class song. Uncle, I am going to send you a copy of our school magazine for last year. My brother did the art work.

Well, my letter is getting long, so I will close. I will be glad to hear from any of the cousins, and with much love, I remain

Your nephew,
V. ELMER JEFFERSON.

Elmer, I'm glad Danville is a live city. I'd hate to think of you as laid away like King Tut-Ankh-Amen—perhaps packed in cotton and with tobacco scattered between your toes to keep away the weevils. I do wish you had sent me your picture, V. Elmer. I would so like to see those sideburns of yours. I have heard about these lawns beneath the ears that are being cultivated on the fair-faced pastures of young southern males, but I want to see just how they work out in practice. Bill was quite impressed by your description and says he thinks you must be almost as good-looking as Cousin Wilmer D. Sweet—who is also a Virginian. After consulting his French dictionary, Bill said perhaps you might be entitled to the Virginia Beauty Belt on points, because your streak of gray hair would give you a more distingue appearance than the plain gold of Wilmer's blond locks. But I told Bill to wait until he saw those sideburns, for it was possible these might queer the whole ensemble, so to speak.

You must tell me, Elmer, why the boys down your way started this sideburning business which has spread like a forest fire in a spring dry spell. Maybe you did it just because the girls gave up sideburns. Or perhaps it was a copying of Rodolph Valentino who has made several appearances on the screen adorned with these extra capillary charms, so I hear. Please reveal all the early and burning history when you send Bill your photograph in the Sweet contest he wants to hold.

Well, Elmer, I'll try and not judge you too harshly about this question of how you choose to wear your surplus hair. But do be careful and not let your safety razor slip some morning and amputate any portion of this warm beauty. I suppose a red-haired boy, Elmer, could have just the hottest sort of sideburns, couldn't he?

VERMILLION, ROUTE 1, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

May I come in and chat for a while? I will sit here near the door so if I see Billy coming I can run away. I enjoy reading the cousins' letters and Uncle's answers. When I feel blue I read them and, Uncle Lisha, I feel better at once.

Uncle, did you ever have a pet woodchuck? I did and about a year ago it disappeared. I don't know if it died or was killed. They can be trained to do tricks.

I am very much interested in raising chickens and intend to raise about two hundred. I am going to keep a few chickens for layers next winter. If Billy does not eat this I will send him two broilers for dinner next summer, and, Uncle, if I see this in COMFORT I will send you a nice big gingerbread.

I will be pleased to get letters from any of the cousins that care to write.

Your niece,
ANNA MAE DENMAN.

No, Anna Mae, I never had a pet woodchuck. I have one pet, of which you have heard, and I want no more. He quite fills the Bill. Yet I know woodchucks are plump and sweet little creatures and can be trained to do all sorts of tricks, just as you say. I knew a very intelligent one who had been taught to sit up on his hind legs and eat off a forty foot row of Black Valentine beans in three minutes. He did it so neatly and cunningly! It was a joy to watch him. He really seemed to enjoy the performance. Woodchucks are useful, too, when trained to dig post holes or excavate gravel pits. It is a shame the one you had disappeared, Anna; you might have tried to teach him this bean trick I have told you about.

You show good judgment in planning to have a few layers among your two hundred hens, Anna Mae. It is always well, I think, to have at least one in every ten that lays once a week—say each Friday. Some people pay no attention to this important thing and just keep chickens anyway. But when I lived on a farm, Anna, I always thought it nice to have an egg now and then from my hundred Buff Rocks. Even if it only seemed to come as a souvenir. It showed that my hens were thinking of me, and I appreciated it. I remember I used to show the egg around and tell all my neighbors about it.

But, Anna Mae, you seem to have a wrong idea about my pet when you talk of sending him two broilers. You meant to write two barrels of broilers, didn't you? You must be thinking of how you fed your woodchuck. You can pack the gingerbread in the top of one of the barrels—marking the head so that I open it before Bill does. This is very important if you wish me to get any of the gingerbread.

HECTOR, ARKANSAS, (THE WONDER STATE.)

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I am in great trouble. I do not know what to do. In the first place I am out of the candy business. I stopped it the day before I started. I have had three thousand orders for fudge and I have never made more than a pound at a time. Oh, my! It is almost too much for my young self to bear. I don't know what to do. My brain is in a whirl.

My castle (of air) has blown up and left me with a sea of letters to sail over. Uncle, let me send them to you, for I cannot handle them. I am afraid the fairer sex does not know just what to do for a lonely person, as only one sent any news and but one sent me anything to read. Dearest Uncle, will you please offer me a solution to my trouble? Please, please, double please.

I will not write much this time. I am almost afraid to show my name.

WILLIAM MARVIN HURLEY.

I don't wonder you are "almost afraid" to show your name, Bill M. After getting all the girls hungry for your fudge and full of pity for your loneliness, you go plum out of the candy business, blow up your Arkansas castle, and start your brain to waltzing. And then, too, you complain about not having anything to read sent you—when you have received three thousand sweet pink, blue and pale green volumes bound with a red stamp. I know something about reading letters, Bill, and I know that three thousand of 'em make quite a fair-sized library to peruse. No; don't you send 'em to me, you ex-castle builder; they were addressed to you and you've got to answer 'em—with or without fudge. You will surely have forgotten what it is to be lonely by the time you have started on the second or third thousand. You've been shown that anybody who lives in an air or airy castle, William, must be careful how they ask help of our Bunch or make promises in an airy manner. For we are a helpful Family and we all like fudge. My advice is that you get your candy kettle out before sugar goes up much more in price!

WAYNOKA, OKLAHOMA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Sh! don't let Billy know I'm here for he'd be certain to chase me home. I live on a ranch and never get to see anyone (never means "not often" with me!) That is, of course, except the boys that work for Dad. I have three brothers but no sisters; but I don't mind that so much for my mother is such a good pal to me. I wonder sometimes at girls not being pals or chums with their mothers. If they all had one like mine they would be—'cause they just couldn't help it! I tell her all my joys, hopes, air castles, and what few sorrows I have take wings usually when I confide in mother. She rides with me, and oh, girls, you don't know what joy it is to see her gallop-

What Men Use

To get those glistening teeth

Note how many men and women show white teeth nowadays.

They are proud to show them when they smile—because they are attractive.

There is a new way of teeth-cleaning which millions now employ. It means whiter, safer, cleaner teeth.

Men who want good teeth should use it. Make this free test and see just what it does.

It removes film

You can feel on your teeth a viscous film. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Food stains, etc., discolor it. Then it forms dingy coats. Tartar is based on film.

That's why teeth look cloudy.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it, and they cause many troubles.

That's how teeth are ruined.

You must do this

Old ways of brushing do not end that film. Some always remains to threaten serious damage night and day.

So dental science sought a film combatant, and two methods were discovered. One acts to curdle film, one to remove it.

Experts proved those ways effective. Then dentists everywhere began to advise their use.

A new-type tooth paste was created, based on modern research. The name is Pepsodent. Those two great film combatants were embodied in it, for daily application.

Now careful people of some fifty nations use this new way to clean teeth.

Fights acid too

Pepsodent also multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids, the cause of tooth decay.

Pepsodent multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits on teeth which may otherwise ferment and form acids.

Those are Nature's great tooth-protecting agents in the mouth. Every use of Pepsodent gives them manifold effect.

Avoid Harmful Grit

Pepsodent curdles the film and removes it without harmful scouring. Its polishing agent is far softer than enamel. Never use a film combatant which contains harsh grit.

The new-day way

Pepsodent is the tooth paste of today. Millions already use it. All careful people will adopt it when they know its benefits.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

Then you will realize what this method means to you, now and in the future. Cut out the coupon now.

COMFORT

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

When Shall I Use Perfume?

"WHEN shall I use perfume?" asks Patty who loves things fragrant; and very downcast she looks when I have to answer: "Almost never!"

But that is the truth, just the same. If Patty wants to do as the best-bred women do, she will use little perfume and only for special purposes. A strong odor of perfume is considered vulgar, probably because in olden times when bathtubs were not so general, it may often have been used to cover up strong body odors. At any rate, it is an accepted fact among well-bred women that much perfume indicates someone not of their caste.

There are ways in which odors may be used, however. Sachets among one's clothes are permissible; this gives just a faint breath of fragrance as one moves about, just enough to be pleasant and not obtrusive. Perfumed face powders and creams are allowable; these too, leave just the faintest fragrance attached to the skin and violate no rule of society.

And upon one's toilet table may be two bottles of perfume or perfumed water. One is perhaps best used in a spray and is a toilet water, not a heavy essence such as we mean when we say "perfume". It is a much diluted perfume and may be sprayed upon the body after a bath, or a few drops of it added to the water in which one bathes one's face and hands. Indeed, instead of adding it to the water, a few drops may be placed in the palms of the hands, and rubbed on face, neck and the hands themselves. For this only lightly sprinkling of the toilet water is needed. When it is used after the bath, the body should be very sparingly sprinkled—just a few drops here and there,—then rubbed with the hands. As soon as the few drops are absorbed, the body should be well powdered, and then nobody can feel any more sweet and fresh than the body's owner.

The other bottle which may find a place on your dressing table is a tiny vial small enough to be slipped into your handbag or purse. Such small bottles with screw tops are sold just to carry in one's purse, and are equipped with a little "dropper," fastened into the screw top, with which one may apply just a drop of perfume where it is permissible.

The size of the bottle and the presence of the dropper indicate that only the tiniest application of perfume is considered allowable. There is one place where it may be applied without offense and that is just back of the lobe of the ear. To touch this spot with the dropper, or with the finger which is barely damp with a drop of perfume, is the last touch to a perfect toilet, and it is positively all the perfume one may use, in addition to that in one's toilet water—which soon evaporates. For this vial of perfume, an essence should be purchased, which is a heavy perfume. Good perfume is expensive, but you only need a quarter of an ounce, so the expense does not so much matter. Choose the odor which you most like, something not too heavy and clinging, then use that perfume both for the vial of perfume in your handbag for your toilet water, and for your sachets. Hyacinth and such heavy odors are not in very good taste.

"Mayn't I use perfume on my handkerchiefs?" asks Patty in dismay. "No, my dear, except that by laying sachets in your handkerchief box there will be the faintest possible fragrance about them to disguise any suggestion of the smell of hot irons or the soapy water which has made them clean. Lemon geranium leaves, laid among one's handkerchiefs or other linen, give a lovely clean fragrance, and lavender has the same quality to recommend it; but if you like other scents better, then choose a sachet like heliotrope or mignonette or violet—orris root—and sprinkle the lining of your sachets with the one you like, laying them, after, among your handkerchiefs, and soon you will feel yourself that this is much more dainty and lovely than drenching them with strong perfume.

Answers to Questions

EMILY.—The best way for a girl of your age to gain in weight is to eat the most nourishing food at regular hours, sleep at least nine hours out of each twenty-four, have plenty of fresh air and exercise. Now let's see what sort of food is nourishing. Potatoes, first: they will help to add flesh to your figure and weight to your record on the weighing machine. Don't eat them fried, however, as fried foods are hard to digest and you probably fail to get the nourishment they contain. Baked potatoes are best of all, baked until they are well done. Boiled potatoes are next best, either cooked with their skins on until they are dry and mealy, or pared with a sharp knife so as not to waste any of the potato but only take off a very thin paring. Eat plenty of potatoes, then, with butter, plenty of good white bread and butter (but no hot breads, such as biscuit), drink milk, eat cereal for breakfast with cream or milk and sugar, eat fruits and vegetables. The potatoes, boiled rice, white bread, cream, butter, sugar, cereal, will all help to make you fat. You may eat meat, too, but it should not be fried, and pork and veal are hard to digest. So that the best meats for you are beef, mutton, lamb, either roasted or broiled but not too well done; chicken or other poultry either roasted or fricasseed, that is stewed; fish, bacon. Eggs are excellent food, but they should be soft-boiled (not over four minutes, and three and a half minutes is better), or poached and eaten soft. Eat at regular hours, chew your food thoroughly, drink plenty of water between meals, take exercise, and be sure about that body bath daily. You say you haven't any bathtub, but that needn't prevent daily bathing of the body. Heat enough water to fill a washbowl, and leave part of a kettle of very hot water for rinsing later. Then bathe an arm, using good white soap and hot water and a washcloth. Keep a kimona or something about the body and only uncover one arm while washing. As soon as it is washed, have another bowl of the clear hot water at hand, and another cloth. With this cloth dipped in the hot water, rinse off the arm, then rub it dry with a Turkish bath towel. Now bathe the other arm, then the face and neck, then the chest, then one leg, the other leg, the back, etc., etc. As you wash each portion, bathe it in clear water, then rub dry. You will be surprised not only how clean you will be, but how fresh and sweet you will feel, and how much better your blood will flow, making you warm instead of "blue and cold" as you speak about. Do this every day, it won't take over fifteen minutes. You can stand on a folded bath towel. Change your underclothing frequently, so that it is always fresh and sweet, and wash your hair once in two or three weeks—don't let it be over three weeks. You won't need powder with this healthful care of your skin, and at your age it is very bad form to use powder or other cosmetics: the daughters of the wealthy and fashionable families are not allowed to do so, and surely you and I are just as important as they, aren't we? So cut out powder, my dear. About keeping the window open at night—isn't there any way you could open the window a few inches, no matter where you sleep? Certainly you do not want to wear tight clothes—nobody wears them any more. The best dressed women, even, wear as few and as loose clothes as possible. The best thing for you to wear under your dresses is a sort of slip or combination of waist and petticoat, with a belt line. Many women wear these. Corsets, of course, my dear, shouldn't wear for years to come. Fashionable women do not wear any unless they have grown so fat they have to. But they are rather careful not to grow fat, so it is safe to say that scarcely any fashionable woman wears a corset. I realize that this is not true in some of the smaller places, but even so there is no reason why a young girl should put on a corset. Just remember that it is unfashionable as well as unhealthful at your age, and I am sure you won't even think of doing it. About that hair, wash it, as I have told you, then brush it gently every day for fifty or more strokes, and soon it will begin to grow and look satiny—smooth and altogether improved. Some girls of your age, part the hair on the left side, and comb it toward the right side from the part. They draw it down a little on the forehead at the right of the part, but fasten it just back and above the right ear with a barette or a clasp of some kind. I expect you could fasten it with a bow of ribbon. Then they cut the hair the same length all around so that it hangs just below the ear—bob it. Perhaps you would like to wear your hair that way. If you have "banged" your hair, then the hair is cut even across the forehead, and even just below the ears, if it is worn bobbed. If you have banged your hair and want it to grow out, then buy some narrow black velvet or taffeta ribbon—about half an inch wide, and bind it back, wearing the ribbon until it grows long enough so it will stay back of itself. Or sometimes, invisible hairpins will help one to tuck the short hairs under the longer ones and pin them, keeping this up until they have time to grow out. Now be careful about daily baths, won't you, and plenty of good food? Drink all the milk you can.

VIRGINIA.—If the wrinkles in the forehead are horizontal, rub them up and down: if they are vertical or up and down, rub them across. In other words, always rub across a wrinkle, never the same way the wrinkle runs. You know in ironing, we always iron across a fold to smooth it out: it is just the same way with wrinkles.

MARYLAND.—I am very sorry the rules of this department prevent answers by mail. The reason is that every answer is intended to help many hundreds of people. You see? About facial massage, cold cream can be applied at night and left on all night. The skin will absorb all the cream. The hands can be creamed at night, and gloves of cotton slipped over them. Be sure the gloves are loose and clean, which means that you will have to wash them each morning. Many women, however, cream the face during the daytime, but these are women who can spend much our in their rooms. They bathe the face, cream it, then either lie down to rest, or read or do things about their rooms. After an hour they bathe the face. Still other women, rub in cold cream after every bathing, and wipe off all surplus with a pad of cotton, then powder over this. Any of these ways are permissible. I happen to use the latter method. The method of massage of the face is to use the forefinger of each hand in a rotary movement across the forehead and across any wrinkles. A rotary movement at the temples. Around the eyes, the forefinger is used to encircle it over and over. Both forefingers are used, one each side of the nose, in a rotary movement. The cheeks are massaged upward from the point of the chin, no downward movement being used. Under the chin is massaged back firmly from the point of the chin. Dip the fingers in cold cream, and smear the face with cold cream first wiping it off so that every particle of soil has been removed. At your age you shouldn't stand badly in need of massage. The daily bath, and exercise, should keep your skin in pretty good condition.

About your hair, if your face is full, you make it look fuller by building the hair out over the ears. Watch for next month's COMFORT, I will give a talk on dressing the hair, with two illustrations of how to put it up in a pretty way. The treatment you speak of removes the oil from the skin and is probably good for a very oily skin. But, on the other hand, oil is what keeps the skin soft and healthy, so if I were you I should stick to natural methods.

NEBRASKA'S SOPHOMORE.—No, my dear, you are not overweight. But about that complexion, there we certainly need to do some reforming, don't we? Blackheads mean that the dust and dirt have not been properly removed from the pores. You need to do two things, first overcome that constipation you speak of; next take a good cold bath daily. For constipation you should both diet and exercise. Get at this seriously, won't you, my dear, because constipation can do more harm than almost any other ill. It keeps the poisons in the body, spoiling the complexion, making the brain stupid and inactive, causing headaches and after awhile it becomes a settled thing so that one never feels well. There isn't any need of having it with at your age it should be the easiest thing in the world to get rid of, so start at it with all seriousness and make up your mind you are not going to have constipation. The first thing you want to do is to drink plenty of water. The body needs much liquid. Drink a glass of water as soon as you get out of bed, and another by the time you are dressed. Drink in between breakfast and lunch, and between lunch and supper, and again before you go to bed. You should drink eight to ten glasses of water every day of your life. Do not drink two or three glasses at one time, for that is not a good thing, as it overloads the stomach for a brief time. But drink a glass, then later another, and so on. If you drink two glasses before breakfast, two in the morning, two in the afternoon, and two afternoon, you will be getting a fair supply. This will help constipation. Next, form the habit of attending to the bowels at a regular time. No matter whether you feel like going, go just the same, and keep at it. Probably you rush in the morning, gulp down a bite, school, and don't take time then, and this is the way you have got into this bad bodily habit. But you can always go at night. It would also be well if you would go in the morning regularly, before you went to school. Can't you try to make a habit of this? Next to water to help the bowel condition, fruit is a help. If you have fresh fruit at hand eat all you can—apples, oranges, melons, berries. Bananas are not good for you, but practically all other fruits are. If you haven't fresh fruit you can eat apple sauce, baked apple, prunes that have been soaked all night then cooked slowly for at least an hour, or dried apricots soaked and cooked in the same way. Potatoes and white bread are constipating, where one is inclined to constipation, and food that is not masticated until it is liquid may also cause constipation. So chew your food thoroughly, if you want to get rid of those pimples and blackheads. Fruits and green vegetables daily—daily, remember—and plenty of water. Then regular bodily habits, going always at the same hour each day. Never "put off going" now if you feel the least inclination go at once. Next a daily body bath. And last, some exercises to help you get rid of that constipation. One of the best exercises is as follows, and may be practiced at night after you are ready for bed or in the morning before you get up. It would be a good plan to practice it both times, as it might help matters. Practice the exercise faithfully, will you not, because we must certainly get rid of that constipation at once. It will mean a clear good skin, and that alone is worth trying for; but much more than that it will mean avoiding many, many illnesses in the future.

Exercise for Constipation

Lying on the back on the bed, in loose clothing—nightdress or pajamas—raise the right leg until it is at right angles with the body. Do not bend the knee. The arms should lie along the sides. Now lower the leg very, very slowly, as if it were being held back by a rope and pulley. Be careful not to bend the knee, and to take as long as possible to let the leg reach the bed. This puts a strain on the abdominal muscles, which helps to start the action we seek. Repeat ten to fifteen times with the right leg, the same number with the left leg. After a time, you can try both legs at the same time, always remembering the two important points, that the knees must be kept rigid, and that the legs must be lowered just as slowly as possible. Practice this faithfully every day, and you will find a big improvement soon. I rely on your courage and perseverance.

ROBINSON—Yes, the electric needle removes hairs without leaving scars. Scars only come from an inexperienced or unskillful operator. I don't know just where your town is, but if it is near Chicago there are many beauty shops, but important ones, which could give you the treatment. This would also be true of St. Louis. The charge is ordinarily five dollars an hour and in fifteen minutes a good many hairs are removed. It hurts, of course, but really I consider the results worth the pain. You are given a little instrument to hold in one hand, or have your finger ends put in a bowl of water. When you put your fingers in the water, or grasp the instruments, then the electric current is on; when you remove them from the water or loosen them from the instruments, the current is off. So the operator inserts the needle in the skin right down into the root of a hair without any electric current. She wears magnifying glasses so that she can see the path of the root. When the needle is right where it should be, she signifies to you that you should put your fingers was so bitter still! But my heart was broken then, and though I have tried to live bravely, I find the wound is not healed even now.

His lordship seemed to have lost all knowledge of where he was, in living over the sad past, and there is no knowing how long he might have gone on in his rambling talk, had not Sir Charles now made his appearance, bearing a salver filled with dainties for his companion.

Isabel was infinitely relieved to see him, for she was suffering torture under this forced inquisition.

The young man bowed to his lordship again as he drew near, although his face expressed some surprise at finding him conversing with Isabel.

"I beg your pardon for my seeming rudeness. There are certain circumstances under which one will sometimes forget one's self. I beg you to forgive and forget what has just occurred."

He turned and left them almost as abruptly as he came, while Isabel sank back into her seat, weak and frightened, although considerably enlightened upon some points. Her tongue had seemed glued to the roof of her mouth, and she could not have answered his questions had he given her the opportunity. She was immensely relieved, however, that it had not been required of her; for she feared she should have committed herself, since it was evident that he knew the history of the jewels which she wore.

She had wronged the governess; the property was hers beyond a doubt, and what should she do about it?

She was filled with dismay; she could not return the jewels, for the young girl was apparently lost to them forever, and she would have to carry about with her always the unpleasant consciousness that she was, as Wilbur had said, the thief.

But it would not do to indulge in such thoughts now, and in explanation of what Sir Charles had just witnessed, she said:

"His lordship thought from my appearance that I was the child of some one whom he knew, and he spoke to me very abruptly."

"My lord is very eccentric about some things; he is getting quite old, too, and people do not mind him," replied Sir Charles, giving the matter no further thought.

CHAPTER XX.

THAT VOICE!

Isabel and her mother were jubilant over the result of Lady Peasewell's drawing-room.

The occasion had been one of signal triumph for the former, for she had been universally declared the belle of the evening—the reigning star in all that brilliant company.

Not so much indeed on account of her superior beauty—for she could lay no claim to beauty of features—as her stately presence, fascinating address, and her rich and elegant attire.

Sir Charles Randal had undoubtedly been deeply impressed, for after his introduction to her he had scarce left her side during the remainder of the evening.

He called the next day, and the next he came to escort her to Buckingham Palace, the queen and her retinue being absent, and he having obtained passes to visit that royal residence so fraught with historic interest.

These incidents led to a more intimate acquaintance, until the young baronet became her almost constant attendant at the opera and other places of amusement, and it soon grew to be common talk that the fair American was likely to win him for a husband.

Isabel's heart often turned longingly toward Adrian Dredmond, for she had been deeply touched by him. He was her ideal of manly excellence and nobility, but she knew how useless was that longing, for that look of scorn which he had given her at Lady Peasewell's told her but too plainly how heartily he despised her.

She had met him since at a number of places of amusement, but he never asked her to dance, or noticed her presence save by a grave, cool bow, and the involuntary curling of his handsome lips, so she turned the battery of her charms upon the baronet, and with much better success.

Sir Charles was accounted a very fine young man, and a great catch, for he, too, was very rich; so that Mrs. Coolidge spread her motherly wings, ruffled her most georgeous plumage, and made much of him, feeling immensely gratified at her daughter's evident conquest, although no proposals had as yet been made.

Two months passed thus; the search for Brownie had been given up by Mr. Coolidge, who could not gain the vestige of a clew to her whereabouts, and he finally came to the conclusion that, despairing of obtaining a situation in exclusive and aristocratic old England, she had returned to her native land, hoping to be more successful there.

What to do with her property was a puzzle to him, and he was greatly troubled on account of it, but he could only lock it carefully away, hoping some time in the future to see her and return it.

Isabel had been successful in returning the gems she had worn to the casket without his knowledge and emboldened by her good luck, she continued, from time to time, to abstract some of them to garnish her ravishing toilets. At length her triumph was complete.

Sir Charles proposed and was accepted, and great was the rejoicing thereof.

His mother at first was somewhat troubled at the idea of his marrying out of his own country—she had hoped he would choose some one from the nobility; but as she was eager to multiply his wordly possessions, and she had heard such accounts of Mr. Coolidge's fabulous wealth, she consented as gracefully as possible, and the contract was finally concluded to the satisfaction of all parties.

Mr. Coolidge, who could not fail to honor the young man, told Isabel that she was getting a husband much too good for her, unless she mended her ways in the future, and it certainly seemed as if she had adopted his advice, for she became so amiable, apparently, that she excited the admiration of all for the time.

Lady Randal was a widow.

At the death of her husband she had been left with two sons, one fifteen, the other, which was Sir Charles, ten.

The elder died in just a year after his father, so that the younger came into the title and property.

There had been a prospect two years after Sir Charles's birth of another addition to the family, but Lady Randal was traveling upon the Continent at the time of its birth, and remained away a year after the event occurred; therefore it occasioned scarce any remark when it was reported that there was no child after all.

When after her return to England, a friend ventured to speak of her disappointment, Lady Randal had put her black-bordered handkerchief to her eyes, and remarked that, "it was so hard to lose one's children," and there the matter dropped.

Not more than a week after the engagement between Sir Charles and Isabel was announced, Mr. Coolidge was suddenly recalled to New York upon important and unforeseen business.

His partner telegraphed for his immediate return, and he departed in great haste, having only a few hours in which to make his preparation and catch the steamer. And in his haste he forgot to take with him, as he had intended, Miss Douglas's casket of jewels.

As soon as Lady Randal knew of his departure, she sent a polite note, containing an invitation, to Mrs. Coolidge and her family, to spend a month with them at their country seat, as they were about departing for a season from town.

This was exceedingly flattering to the Coolidges, and the last of February found them domiciled at "Vallingham Hall," near the ancient and beautiful town of West Malling, Kent County; all but Wilbur, who, still heartsore and filled with anxiety upon Brownie's account, resolved to try to lose himself in a trip to Switzerland and the Alps.

Lady Randal and her servants preceded her guests by a week to the Hall, leaving Sir Charles behind to escort their visitors, so that upon their arrival everything was in readiness for them, and they received a most cordial welcome.

Vallingham Hall was a handsome, though rather an ancient-looking structure, built partly of brick and partly of stone. The central portion seemed much older than the rest, a couple of wings and other additions having evidently been built on at different times. It had mullioned windows, and wide, massive doors, which gave it a grand and imposing appearance. The beautiful ivy, green and luxuriant, which clambered upon its sides to the very top of some of its turrets, gave it also a picturesqueness which made it charming to every one, and more than one artist, enamored of its beauty, had reproduced it upon canvas.

About a mile from the Hall, and standing within the limits of its park, there was a charming little villa of quite modern structure and having such an air of comfort and coziness about it that it tempted the beholder to seek an entrance and obtain a glimpse within, wondering if the inside were as attractive as the outside.

Vallingham Hall was already gay with company when the Coolidges arrived, and more was expected the following week.

Sir Charles's courtship seemed to be of the most blissful nature, at least to two persons.

Isabel was brilliant from her conquest, and rendered herself so fascinating to everybody that the young man was nearly overwhelmed with congratulations at having won so bonny and wealthy a bride, although among some of the high-born damsels, who were husband-hunting for themselves, there was now and then the curl of a red lip, and murmur of scorn about "plebeian blood."

Lady Randal, ignoring caste entirely, was always eulogizing Isabel's "elegant manners, and her exquisite taste in dress," and promising herself "so much happiness with a daughter, which she had always wanted, but never had."

Mrs. Coolidge spared neither labor nor expense for her eldest, and her wardrobe was the most recherche of anything to be seen among all the visitors at the Hall, while the jewels which she wore were a marvel to every one, and helped to swell the reports of her vast wealth.

When she found that her father had departed without taking them with him, she was delighted, and appropriated them without a scruple, and, as time wore away, she began to look upon them as almost belonging to her.

It must be confessed that she stood a little bit in awe of her high-born lover.

It did not take her long to discover that he was actuated only by the loftiest sentiments.

His manner was as courteous to a servant or an inferior as to an equal, and he never stopped to consider the position of any one when granting a favor.

The beggar of the peer was befriended with equal kindness.

Open and frank himself, he could not tolerate deception or hypocrisy in any one, and a deliberate wrong incurred his deepest displeasure.

Of course, the haughty and selfish girl could feel no sympathy with any such sentiments so foreign to her own nature, but having once learned Sir Charles's idiosyncracies, and being extremely anxious to share his coronet and plethoric purse, she exerted herself to the utmost to blind his eyes, and, to all outward appearance, she became a most earnest advocate of all his philanthropic schemes, much to his satisfaction, and the secret contempt and amusement of Viola and Alma, who neglected no opportunity when alone with their sister to torment her about it.

One evening Sir Charles invited her to walk over a portion of the estate with him, and unfolded to her his plans for beautifying it, and of improving the condition and comfort of his tenantry.

She strove to listen attentively, and appear interested in it all, but it was hard work, and although she was exceedingly kind and gracious to all whom she met, and won for herself high encomiums for her sweetness among his people, yet her heart was not in it, and she was immensely relieved when they turned their steps homeward.

On their way they had to pass the villa before described.

Just before reaching it, Sir Charles had called her attention to a lovely view.

They stood silent for several minutes enjoying it, when suddenly a few rich chords, struck upon a fine-toned piano, saluted their ears, and then a voice of ravishing sweetness and power burst forth into joyous song.

Isabel started at the sound as if a wasp had stung her.

"Who is that?" she demanded, her face flushing with a sudden thought and fear.

"It comes from yonder villa. Did it startle you?" asked Sir Charles, regarding her disturbed manner with some surprise.

"A little—it was so quiet before."

"I think it very fine," he replied, stopping to listen again to the clear, beautiful tones.

"Who lives there?" Isabel asked, an anxious expression on her face.

CHARLES WILLIAM STORES
161 Stores Building, New York City

"Lady Ruxley, an aged aunt of my mother's."

"Indeed! I thought she resided with you," she said, wondering why a lady of such high degree should be living in what appeared to her such limited quarters.

She had heard of Lady Ruxley before, and knew that it was from her Sir Charles was to inherit a large amount of his property.

She had never met her, although she was quite curious about her, having heard much about her peculiarities.

"Lady Ruxley always makes it her home with us while we are in town, but when we come to Vallingham Hall she prefers to be by herself, and a few years since she had this villa built, so as to escape the gayety and confusion which always reign there," Sir Charles explained.

"Does she live alone?" Isabel queried, with a thoughtful look.

"She has never had any one but her servants, until within the past few years she has had a companion to read to and amuse her. She is quite old."

"Ah, then it must be her companion who is singing now," and she leaned eagerly forward to listen again. "Who is she?" she asked, somewhat sharply, when after a moment the sweet singer suddenly ceased.

"I really do not remember the name—some unfortunate individual, I believe, who met with an accident, enlisted Aunt Ruxley's sympathies, and she insisted upon having her as a companion. I have never seen her. Indeed," he added, smiling, "my time has been so fully occupied in another direction lately that I have not paid much attention to other people's affairs," and Sir Charles bestowed a fond look upon his betrothed, which called the bright color to her cheeks, and the smile to her lips again.

She asked no more questions, and they remained a few moments longer gazing into the valley; then, as the sun sank out of sight, and the air began to grow keener, they turned their faces homeward.

As they passed the villa they caught a glimpse of an old woman bent nearly double with age, hobbling into the house from the vine-covered porch.

She was leaning upon the arm of a slender, graceful figure, who seemed to be clad in deep mourning, the sight of which made Isabel Coolidge's heart bound again with a sudden fear, and she bent forward for a better view.

She could not distinguish the person clearly, for the shadow of the vines about the door made it impossible, but a nameless dread of something, she knew not what, pursued her the entire evening, which neither the gay company at the Hall nor her lover's fondest words could make her forget.

A KISS IN THE DARK

"BUT I've no right to load my troubles on an absolute stranger, Professor Sherman, although the temptation is great," Lorin Fisher replied smiling.

"Just imagine that I'm your grandfather," he answered persuasively, "what difference does it make? You barely know my name; I did not catch yours when we were introduced yesterday—we'll probably never meet again."

"'Ships that pass in the night,'" murmured Lorin softly. "All right; you might help me to a decision. This letter is from my aunt out in California. She wants me to come live with her. She says I'd have nothing to do but enjoy myself month in and month out. Now I've always wanted to live in California. I have never been there, but I've often dreamed of it."

"Then why not go?"

"That isn't all. I remember my aunt well, 'though I haven't seen her in years; she has a will of her own. She'd be perfectly lovely to me—in her own way—but I'd be her property, if you can understand that."

He nodded.

"There's worse yet. My aunt has a nephew. She simply adores him. According to her, he is the most wonderful man in the world. I know she'd serve him morning, noon, and night. She'd marry me to him before I'd been there a year. Oh, you needn't smile—she'd manage me and him, too."

"That might be a good thing; maybe you would fall in love with him."

"No, I wouldn't," she cried vehemently, "I fairly detest him as it is, just because she has tried so hard to interest me in him."

He glanced at her curiously. "You shouldn't do that," he said mildly, "it isn't fair to the man. What sort of a fellow is he? Did you ever see him?"

"If you believe Aunt Anna, he is a good-sized piece of human perfection. No, I never saw him. I might have once—but I ran away," she answered, glancing out over the river.

He started suddenly and looked at her with fresh interest.

"I'll say this much for him," Lorin went on, "I like his spirit. He refused to allow my aunt to support him—told her that he didn't want her money, that he was a man and intended to do a man's part in the world. She educated him, but he has worked hard and paid her back every cent she ever spent on him. I think aunt said he was a college professor out there somewhere."

"You might like him, if you knew him," he began.

"No, I wouldn't," Lorin interrupted, "and, if I've been thrown at his head as he has at mine, I am sure he would loathe the very sight of me. Besides, I just know he is stoop-shouldered and red-headed; all these very studious men are."

He was digging in the dirt with a stick. A smile hovered about his lips. "I wouldn't say that all well-informed men were like that," he said softly.

"Oh, I beg pardon," Lorin cried, flushing rosily, "I didn't mean——"

"Never mind," he interrupted in his turn, "'present company always excepted,' you know. Leave the vexing question alone for awhile and let's go for a walk."

Lorin arose and thrust the letter in her pocket. "I'll do it," she said, "though I'm due at the Normal this moment."

"You don't look like a teacher," he remarked as they strolled along the river bank toward the more secluded part of the park.

"I am—a teacher and a spinster. You know that old maid school teachers usually grow 'cranky'; that's one reason why I'm tempted to accept aunt's offer. I am twenty-three—and I've taught for four years."

"I see right now where you are drifting; you'll go to California and take the red-headed professor."

"No, indeed. Speaking of school teachers reminds me that our superintendent left us last week for richer fields. The members of the Board are very much put out. It is so late now, they don't know where to find another man to take his place."

"That is unfortunate," he replied, "where do you teach?"

"In Bertram, a small country town south of here."

The conversation drifted to other things. Lorin found her companion a very charming man. He spoke little of himself, but was a sympathetic listener and made her feel that he thought her and her affairs of vital interest. She was quite certain that that day would always stand out in her memory as a red letter day.

"It shall not be 'Ships that pass in the night,'" he said as he put her on her car at parting time, "I must see you again."

"Perhaps we may meet again," Lorin said, returning his earnest gaze.

For days, he was constantly in her thoughts. Wherever she went, her eyes swept the crowds hoping to catch a glimpse of his handsome dark face, but she always met with disappointment. Thus summer passed.

With the coming of the first Tuesday in September, came the opening of the Bertram school. At the last moment, the School Board had been fortunate enough to secure for superintendent, the services of a man who came very highly recommended. They were to be congratulated, the president of the Board said in speaking of the matter. The new superintendent did not make his appearance until the night before school opened.

On opening morning, the High School auditorium was crowded with children and patrons of the school. The faculty sat in a group near the front. On the rostrum, solemn and dignified, waited the School Board. Everybody was curious to see the new superintendent. All eyes were turned toward the main entrance, so nobody saw him quietly enter through the back door. He was on the platform, well in the midst of the School Board, before even they were aware of his presence. The president of the Board, turning for a word with his colleagues, saw their superintendent taking his seat. This was the signal for the exercises to begin. The village orchestra rendered a selection and then the president of the School Board arose and said the same things which he had been saying on similar occasions for the past four years. He then introduced the new superintendent and sat down, vigorously mopping his heated brow.

A tall dark man stepped to the front of the platform and began to speak easily. After her first glance at him, Lorin shrank behind the teacher in front of her. She could not again lift her eyes. She felt that her cheeks were burning. Such a rush of emotions overpowered her, she was only dimly conscious of her surroundings. The stranger's voice and face carried her back to that gloriously happy day in the park. She glanced covertly about, hoping that no one had noticed her confusion; it seemed that they had not. Her pulse began to beat more evenly and she settled herself to listen, but, for the life of her, she could not keep her mind on the present. Her thoughts would stray to that other day and she sought frantically to remember just what she had said to this man. There had been a lot of foolishness, she knew. Lorin felt that she could not face him—and, yet, she had to meet him—and to work with him through the whole school year.

At length the services ended and the teachers crowded up to meet their superintendent. Lorin held back till the very last. She had regained her composure, but was quite pale with the effort. She wondered if he would know her. Would he by word or look recall that other meeting? She wanted him to remember it and, yet, she knew that she would be furious if he showed anything of the kind.

At last her turn came. She slowly advanced and held out her hand. As his hand clasped hers, she lifted her eyes for a moment. He was looking at her gravely, courteously, but with no hint of claiming previous acquaintance. Lorin drew her hand away, made the usual remarks and passed on; the ordeal was over.

The first week of school passed without incident. Lorin saw little of Professor Sherman. Like herself, he was very busy. At four o'clock Friday afternoon, came the first teachers' meeting. Most of the teachers had gathered in the superintendent's office and were discussing their summer vacations, while waiting for Professor Sherman to make his appearance. In some way, the subject of 'kissing' came up.

"What would you do if some one should kiss you without permission?"

"What would you do," Lorin was asked, "if some one should kiss you without permission?"

Lorin was at the blackboard drawing. Laughing, she faced the others. "I wouldn't give a fig for a man who was not bold enough to kiss me without the asking," she said saucily.

The next moment she could have bitten her tongue out; for the words had barely passed her lips before Professor Sherman, followed by Professor Sloan, the science teacher, entered the door. She was certain that they had heard her because Professor Sloan made some facetious reply to her remark. Professor Sherman, beyond giving her a casual glance, took no notice of the occurrence.

Lorin's fellow teachers shouted with merriment. They knew Lorin well and took her remark as lightly as it was meant, but they couldn't resist teasing her, she looked so like a child caught in mischief. Even Professor Sherman allowed a smile to hover about his lips.

Lorin wished that she could hide herself somewhere. Another bit of folly for this man to remember against her, she thought bitterly. She wondered why she must always do the wrong thing. All the week long, his image had filled her heart. She wanted his good opinion as she wanted nothing else on earth. She had admired him on that first day and the feeling had intensified with every passing day since. Mortified beyond expression, she silently took a back seat and absently listened to discussions of school work. She spoke only when asked a direct question and answered then with evident effort.

Lorin worked harder that session than she had ever done before. She felt that Professor Sherman was always watching her. He was never critical or exacting in his demands, yet she imagined that he did not like her. It seemed to her that she never looked up that he was not either just passing her door or pausing to look in. She thought it was because he wanted to keep her work up to standard and it made her furious to think he had so little confidence in her. She hated herself for not despising him. The girl could hardly wait for school to close, she was so anxious to get away—anywhere—so she would not have to meet him almost every hour of every day. She counted the days as impatiently as the children did and, secretly, rejoiced as much as they when the final month came.

And then one Sunday night, three weeks before the close of school, occurred the incident which brought things to a climax. Lorin entered church late and slipped quietly into a seat near the back of the house. She had the bench to herself. The one just back of her was occupied by Professor Sherman and Professor Sloan only.

Quite without warning, the lights went off. The minister rambled on in the dark while they waited for the lights to come on again. The minutes passed and still there was darkness. Suddenly Lorin felt a man's hand under her chin. Her bare head was gently but firmly tilted back and a fervent kiss pressed on her crimson lips; then she was released.

Lorin sat aghast. She could not cry out; she could only sit still in impotent rage. There had been no sound—she could not guess who was the guilty man. Not by the wildest stretch of imagination, could she believe it was the man just back of her. While she writhed in helpless exasperation and shame, the lights flashed on.

She could not resist a hasty glance behind her. Professor Sherman sat staring straight ahead, his arms folded across his breast. From the far end of the bench, Professor Sloan smirked at her. Immediately Lorin decided, with a feeling akin to nausea, that he was the man who had kissed her. She had disliked him before, but now she fairly loathed him. She heard little of the sermon after that and hurried away at the close of the services, evading Professor Sloan, who she felt sure, meant to ask to accompany her home.

After an almost sleepless night, Lorin took up her work Monday morning heavy eyed and miserable. She refused to speak to Professor Sloan whom she passed on her way to school. All the week she avoided him. From Monday morning till Friday afternoon, one question tormented her—why not resign? She knew that there would be strong protest, both from the School Board and Professor Sherman. There were only two more weeks of school, but could she hold out? Her nerves were worn to shreds; the children were noticing that she had become impatient and irritable; she was the mere shadow of the girl who had taken up her work so gaily the previous fall. Finally she decided that she would quit, she didn't care what anybody said. So, waiting until the other teachers and pupils had gone on Friday afternoon, she marched boldly into the superintendent's office.

Professor Sherman sat at his desk writing. He motioned her to a seat and, after one glance at her pale, tense face, walked over to the door and closed it.

He came back and seated himself on the opposite side of the desk, facing her. "Now what's the trouble?" he asked gently. "I've noticed that something has been bothering you all the week."

"I've come to tell you that I'm going to resign," Lorin said slowly.

"Resign!" he exclaimed. "You surely would not do that so near the end of the term. It would create such confusion and disturbance in our work. You don't mean that you want to quit at once?" He was greatly disturbed.

"Yes," answered Lorin, her eyes anywhere but on his, "I cannot teach another day."

"Do you mean that you are ill? Of course, in that case——"

"No, no!" she cried vehemently, "it isn't that. I—I can't explain."

"But there will have to be some explanation," he said gravely. "Surely you can tell me your reason, Lorin," he added gently.

Lorin sought desperately for an explanation which she could give him. At last she resolved to tell him a part of the truth at least. "It's—it's Professor Sloan," she said in a low voice, "I just cannot bear him."

"Sloan—what has he done?" he was utterly surprised.

Lorin's cheeks were burning. "If you must know, he has annoyed me with his attentions since last fall and he—he kissed me," she stammered miserably.

"Kissed you! the impudent pup!" he sprang to his feet. "I'll speak to the man myself; you shall have no further annoyance from that source. When did he kiss you?"

"It was at church last Sunday night—when the lights went off—you remember." Her head went down on the desk; she could not say another word about the shameful incident. He started and glanced at her quickly. After a few minutes of silence, he asked, still gently, "Lorin, is that all that is troubling you?"

Suddenly she lifted her head and said, flashing eyes, "No, it is not. You have not treated me fairly. You do not like me. You have not trusted me. You have watched and tried me the whole school year, and because I made that silly remark at the beginning of school, you thought I was no more. You ought to have known I never meant a word of that." She was struggling to keep back the tears.

He was striding up and down the room. When she had finished, he came and stood beside her. Though he spoke in a low voice, every word was charged with suppressed feeling. "Lorin," he said, "I simply worship you. I've been crazy about you ever since that first day of ours. If I've watched you, it's been for the reason that I just could keep out of your presence. I've hoped that you would show by some little sign that you, too, cared a little. When you left me there in the park, I knew that I had found the only woman in the world for me. I came down out here to apply for the superintendency position in this school. There was some delay and when I returned to the city, you were gone and I did not know where to look for you. I had to return to California to get leave of absence there, in order to take this work. I reached Bertram only the night before school opened. Next morning when from this chair I saw you passing down the corridor, it was all I could do to refrain from rushing out and clasping you in my arms. When you shook hands with me, I hoped that you would show that you remembered, but you did not—so I had to accept your decision."

Lorin sat with her head buried in her arms which rested on the desk. She was crying. The restraint of months had broken down and she could not stop.

He dropped to his knees beside her chair, drew her head to his shoulder. "Cry, dear," he said softly, "it will do you good." He did not speak again, but occasionally stroked her hair with gentle, caressing hands. Gradually Lorin's sobbing ceased and she sat very still.

"Haven't you anything to say to me, Lorin?" he asked appealingly.

Lorin glanced up at him shyly. "I have a great deal to say, but somehow, it won't say itself," she whispered. "It's so good to know that you cared all along."

He laughed happily and opened his arms. "'Care' is a feeble word," he said. Then he bent his head over hers. "I won't ask permission," he teased.

A little while later, they were both sitting on the edge of the desk. "I think I'll resign anyway," Lorin said saucily, "I'm afraid of you now!"

"Would you want me like that?" he asked reproachfully. "How do you think I'd ever get anything done? I'd be all the time running down to see you. Help me finish this job; then we'll name the day for California. We'll spend our honeymoon on Catalina Island and this fall you can begin keeping house for the red-headed professor."

"Oh," gasped Lorin, "what do you mean?"

"I'm Aunt Anna's nephew. Didn't she ever mention my name to you?"

"As I told you before, I have not seen her in years. She always spoke of you as 'Sonny.' Though your name did sound vaguely familiar, I never connected you with Aunt Anna's nephew. I never thought he'd be so nice. When did you find out that I was Aunt Anna's niece?"

"I've known who you were from the first. I guessed it that day in the park. Aunt Anna had talked so much about you, I was curious to know you. I came out here hoping to meet you and as soon as I saw you, I fell in love with you. Aunt Anna has known about it all along."

"She will rejoice to know how things have turned out," Lorin murmured softly. "Now I really must go."

"Just a moment," he begged, holding her close, "I want to relieve your mind about something—it was not Sloan who kissed you that night in church."

faithful in his fashion"—as far as gates of nameful death.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE RED MOUSE.

"Jacky," said Gillian in a queer, hoarse oice, "Jacky, look!"

It was nine o'clock in the common, dingy odging house where they had found a refuge—dirty, out-at-elbows place in the Northend oad, where the landlady had asked for no eferences beyond the sight of her week's oney paid in advance. Spring was coming owly, out in the country they had left, with weet scents of budding trees; here in London mnibuses crawled through the reeking mud, nder their window a fish-vender sold stale sh by the flare of a paraffin torch; and yet ll now they had been happier there than ever Hamilton Place. For the jewels, safely ealed, had been sent the day before to Scotnd Yard; sent by the expressman like an veryday bundle. As the clock struck the rst stroke of nine Jacky was almost gay for ome what might, they had saved little Mrs. areham; but as the last stroke died away she eard Gillian speak suddenly, and her heart ied within her.

What was the matter?

For Gillian had sprung to her feet, and stood olding out the evening paper they never dared o go to bed without reading and she was embling from head to foot, as a woman only oes in unbearable fear or pain.

"Jacky!" she repeated, her teeth chattering, read this!"

The younger sister snatched the paper. Its adly printed columns swam under her eyes in he dim gas-light.

Gillian pointed to something in big black tters, and Jacky's face turned white as hers.

"Extraordinary Restitution of Stolen Jewels -Murderers of Paul Marchmont Conscience-ricken—The Mystery of His Death Solved."

Painfully, as though she spelled out each ord, Jacky Hamilton read down the half-colmn of close type, that brought beads of cold ear on her forehead.

"Our readers," it said, "will be interested o learn that an incident almost unparalleled the records of Scotland Yard occurred yesteray when all the jewels stolen in the great ellford House robbery were returned to the olice by the prosaic hands of Carter, Patterson & Co., the great carriers.

"On inquiry at the office it was learned hat the ordinary brown paper parcel which ontained them was brought in by a shabbily essed girl, thickly veiled. The clerk who eceived the parcel remembered it distinctly om the fact that it was done up in a peculiar ay and sealed in every possible place with d wax.

"No doubt is felt by the police that the nder was one of the two Hamilton girls, hose mysterious disappearance from Hamilon Place on the night of the murder has ever been explained; and this conscience-ricken act has thrown a sudden light on the urder itself, as well as on the burglaries ccurring in the neighborhood.

"The Daily Mail is, as usual, the first to arn the fact which will electrify all London hat warrants are out for the arrest of both rls for the robberies which have so far been a ystery, and also for the murder of Paul archmont.

"For in the old house where the murder ok place a secret passage exists, ending in a ve with an outlet into the grounds, and rough that passage the murderess undoubtedescaped. We say murderess advisedly, nce on the cellar stones the police have disovered the print of a girl's small hand, marked blood, an unmistakable record of the author the crime.

"The murder is one of peculiar atrocity, hen it is remembered that the late Mr. Marchmont had adopted one of the missing girls from pure charity. It has been learned from the faithful servants of the dead man that she rewarded him with hatred and ingratitude, but it was not until the extraordinary restitution of the jewels taken from Wellford House that the real history of the crime was unveiled.

"It is not believed by the police that the elder of the two girls, having introduced her sister into Marchmont's house on false pretenses, profited by the opportunities given them as mistress and maid to rob right and left at Wellford House, the supposed maid stealing the jewels from the rooms of the guests, while her mistress, apparently guiltless, idsarmed suspicion by never leaving the ballroom. That Mr. Marchmont discovered this crime and taxed them with it would explain his death, since both girls must have been quite unscrupulous, and when driven to desperation would have been quite equal to over-powering a small, elderly man. It is supposed that one of them held him from behind while the other stabbed him with his own knife, a large one, which he used for pruning the roses, which were his great hobby. They then fled from the house by the secret passage, of which they must have been well aware, since Hamilton Place had been the home of their family for centuries, until want of money forced their father to sell it.

"Tardy repentance or fright has evidently impelled the guilty girls to make the restitution of the jewels which had caused so great a sensation and supplied the mysterious robbery and murder with a clear solution. That they are in London is certain, and their apprehension is now merely a matter of time. To their hiding-place the police already have a clue, and right-minded people will rejoice that they will undoubtedly suffer for their crimes.

"The appearance of the stolen jewels has come just in time to keep a certain 'celebrated case' from coming into court. A very pretty and popular lady will be congratulated on the discovery of the mystery surrounding her loss of some borrowed jewels, which leaves her reputation unstained by an accusation now proved to have been utterly unfounded."

Jacky dropped the paper.

"It's wicked, wicked," she gasped, "to let them publish lies like that! How dare they take it for granted that any one is guilty till they're tried? Don't look like that, Gill! They can't make out we did it."

"We can't prove we didn't." The voice of despair cut at Jacky's heart; for the first time she realized where they stood, to what a desperate pass they had come.

"And if we tell the truth twenty times over," the miserable voice went on, "it will be no good. Lesard will be gone by that time to some safe place. He will read the papers and laugh to see me bearing his sins while he gets off. And Mrs. Gibbs—she will believe I did it——"

"Why do you say 'I'? Why not 'us'?" in sharp interruption.

"Because I told Sir Charles I hated Marchmont, and Mrs. Gibbs knew it, too."

"Sir Charles will believe in you."

"No one believes in a girl like me."

"Hush! cried Jacky angrily. "Sit down. We must think what we're to do."

Her own heart was beating in sickening thumps, but for all that she could still hope in the truth that shames the devil.

"Do you think they have traced us?" she pointed to the papers.

"It doesn't matter. They will if they haven't."

Jacky kicked at a hole in the carpet, whistling tunelessly after her fashion.

"They sha'n't—I won't let them!" she said, breaking off suddenly. "Listen, Gill, we'd better get out of this. We're pretty; people notice us too much even in this house."

"We'll be turned out next week! I've spent or lost, or something, all the money Sir Charles lent me."

"But there's ten pounds for me at the bank."

Gillian began to laugh hysterically, dreadfully.

"Who would cash your checks here in London unless they knew you?" she said, with chattering teeth. "And in the face of this," touching the ill-omened newspaper, "I don't suppose even you are going to walk calmly into the bank and demand your money."

Jacky sat aghast, beyond even whistling. She had never thought of that.

"Write to Sir Charles," she suggested forlornly.

"Who is probably leading the hue and cry against us by now."

The quick pain in Gillian's voice made Jacky look sharply at her. Why was she so bitter against the man who had certainly been her friend?

"You've no right to speak like that," she returned coldly.

Gillian burst into a storm of sobbing.

"No, no," she cried. "I know. I didn't really mean it. But just because he was good to us is the reason I won't drag him into our affairs. Oh, Jacky, he was kind to us; he was a gentleman, and if I wrote I might get him into dreadful trouble."

"He's a man," bitterly; "men keep clear of trouble."

"I can't write—don't you see I can't? I that am"—shame in her voice that would once have been proud—"Lesard's wife."

"Don't!" said Jacky fiercely, even yet stung beyond endurance that any other woman should have been Lesard's wife. And yet she hated him all the more fiercely for Gillian's wrongs, till the love that was turned to loathing in her bit at her heart for the deadly vengeance that might yet be had on Lesard.

"Why do you think he's gone?" she demanded, and even yet could not speak the name that she had loved.

"He's not a fool, and he had money. Besides, at first he would not know he had me, his wife, for a scape-goat. He had to go."

"He may come back—when he knows."

The smile that no happy woman has the trick of came to Gillian's lips, bitter, delicate.

"Not he, not Lesard," she said gently. "You may put what you're thinking of out of your mind, Jacky. Even if you could do it, it would kill me. I will never let the world—or"—she stopped Charles Vivian's name on her lips—"or any one know I was ever Lesard's wife, his foolish, happy slave. Tell me," more gently still, "do you think any one in that express-office could swear to you?"

"Not as the red-haired girl who was at Hamilton Place," swiftly, for the waves of burned gold shone unstained now in the burnished curls Lesard had loved. "Try not to despair, Gill, they can't know what the paper says. Think of the many, many guilty people who must have escaped from far worse places than we are in, who are innocent. Let's go to bed now. Tomorrow we can think of somewhere to go."

"On that?" returned Gillian, dryly, holding out six shillings. But she got up and went over to their bed as if she were too weary to care for anything but sleep.

In the ugly light from a dirty gas-globe the younger sister sat thinking, her curled gold head bowed on her arms that were folded on the table.

Money they must have, or else clear themselves even as little Mrs. Fareham had been cleared, but there was no one to play Don Quixote for them as they had for her.

The hate for the man she had loved—that hate which has driven even good women to madness—seemed to quicken in her as Gillian's sleep on their miserable bed deepened. A curious thrill went through Jacky Hamilton's whole body—a mad hope that was devilish.

With a speed that was uncanny in its noiselessness, she got up, and, seizing on Gillian's hat, stole from the room. The clock upstairs struck ten as she slipped out into the bustling thoroughfare of the Northend Road. Women with baskets jostled her; men stared at her, and turned away sharply as they saw her eyes that were fixed as though she looked on a horror. Presently she found herself in a cross street, going she knew not where, walking because the movement helped her to plan out what was in her heart, led unfalteringly by some spirit in her feet.

When she had walked for half an hour like one who follows through thick mist a well-known path she realized where she was—but not why she was there, nor what such a place could have to do with Jacky Hamilton.

She stood in a well-lit, quiet street—quiet but for the hansoms that flashed up it and stopped at the portico of a smart stone house opposite her, where men got out and went in.

She knew the place for a sort of private gambling-house kept by a woman, a gorgeously handsome creature who drove herself in the park in a high mail phaeton, always alone, always insolent, parading her brazen beauty before the world.

The girl with whom Jacky had lived during those few happy months in London, when the world had seemed a place of roses and silver trumpets and Lesard, had pointed one day, with tears in her honest young eyes, to the shining carriage, the solitary woman.

"She was the daughter of the innkeeper in our village," she had said, "and look at her now. Oh, it is a dreadful place, London. The Red Mouse, they call her, because she has gnawed through so many men's fortunes and her money is stained with blood. She keeps a gambling-house, but the police never trouble her. She has too many friends with heavy hands."

The words came back now to the pale girl with the hard-set mouth, standing in the street, splashed by the mud from those flying hansoms. It was the house of the Red Mouse she stood before; there and nowhere else her business lay. But even yet she did not know what she had come to do.

The night was strangely warm and clear for March; the wide, double doors of the house were flung wide to the portico of white stone that shone like marble in the keen electric light over the doorway.

Jacky, as if the light fascinated her, drew slowly nearer, till she stood on the pavement directly in front of the door and could see into the hall.

It was carpeted with red, soft and thick like velvet, and in the dimly glowing light of rose and amber lamps she saw the luxury that reigned in the house. Flowers, statues, pictures, she could see, and a mounting trail of perfumed smoke that rose from a great brass incense-burner at the foot of the marble staircase. A man servant in plain clothes stood motionless in the doorway, never even glancing at the small figure in black on the sidewalk.

Jacky—staring into the house that so cleverly evaded the law, where no one ever passed the sentinel servant who did not bear an orthodox invitation-card in the handwriting of its mistress—wondered afresh why she had come.

Heavy with the dreadful fears that had come to her with the reading of the papers, maddened with the longing to make Lesard know that her own hand could strike in the dark as surely as his own, the girl did not notice as a small dainty brougham drew up just behind her.

"Now, then, child," said a woman's voice at Jacky's shoulder—a voice with a telltale hoarseness in it—"don't stop all the way."

Jacky swung around, startled.

It was the Red Mouse herself. Tall, fair, exquisitely made, she stood waiting to pass, her clear-cut face gay and insolent. There was too much rouge on the lovely cheeks, too much carmine on the hard mouth, a line of black on the eyelids that showed in the searching electric light. But at none of these was Jacky Hamilton staring like one who sees a ghost.

Her cloak of palest violet satin, soft with ermine, filmy with lace, had fallen back from the shoulders of the Red Mouse. She held it on with one strong hand, laughing at the surprise on the face of the loitering girl. It was not often that a woman gazed at her beauty with such excited, covetous eyes. But Jacky had never even glanced at that painted face.

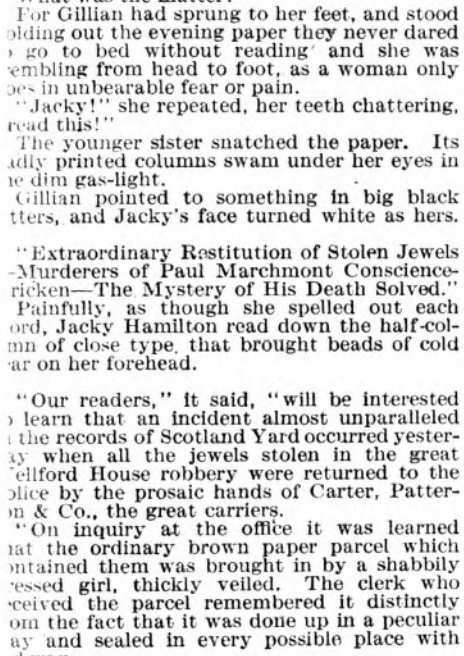
On the white throat of the Red Mouse, that rose like a lovely column where the cloak had slipped back, shone and sparkled something whose unholy fire Jacky knew.

It was the necklace of black diamonds that Lesard had taken from the cellar.

There was no mistaking it, shining red and green, with the center of each stone a scintillating spot of white light.

"Oh!" gasped the girl, and cried instinctively, "how lovely!"

The Red Mouse was good-natured to recklessness. "What? My necklace?" She paused, facing the shabby girl. "Bah! I only like it because it's new. I paid too much for it, only this afternoon."



"You bought it from Lesard!" cried Jacky, and then could have bitten her tongue at her own madness.

"What if I did? It's none of your business!" said the Red Mouse rudely. "Get out of the road, will you?" And the scent of her satins and laces reached Jacky as she brushed by.

She knew now why she had come here at this hour. Lesard was still in London.

Gillian, who had been his wife, was tongue-tied, but not Jacky, who hated him with the hate of hell—who must hang if he went free!

Incontinence of Urine, or Bed-Wetting

IN choosing this for our subject for this month's talk we think we are discussing a subject of great importance, a subject that is less understood by both parents and physician than any other pertaining to the health and well being of babies and children. There are few conditions which call for more careful investigation than this, and few conditions which such a variety of circumstances may conspire to bring about. There are few conditions about which physicians are consulted, so often, few conditions which he treats with such poor success, and the parents go from one physician to another in their efforts to get relief from this distressing condition.

If one blindly treats a case and gets good results he deceives himself with the idea that he has found something that offers relief to all cases, which is far from the truth as it is possible to get.

Granting that it is due to a nervous fault, the results of treatment would go to show that sometimes it is due to a hypersensitiveness of the nerve center of the spinal cord in the lumbar region, or some trouble in the centers higher up in the cord of which it should convey our knowledge of the need for action.

The bladder becomes full and the order is given to empty it, this being done through our wonderful nerve system, much like a telephone system.

On account of some trouble with the wire or the receiving end the message is never received and the bladder in desperation emties itself in the bed or wherever it can do so with the least resistance, a voluntary act becomes an involuntary one.

As the physician studies these cases, and figures out the cause in each individual case he soon finds that there are very many things that must be taken into consideration.

In some cases the constitutional build of the patient must be considered, the sleeping habits, the nervous system, the condition of bladder and rectum, worms, the condition of the urine, the diet, too much meat, too many sweets or pastry, and in cases of long standing the question of habit

We mean by habit this; the cause may be removed, but the condition continues through force of habit, a strong element in the human being.

After this explanation you will understand that to treat successfully all cases of bedwetting you must be prepared to make an extensive inquiry of somewhat of a complicated nature in each individual case.

You will also understand why it is not advisable to hit out at random with bromide or belladonna in the treatment of a case when you are asked for some remedy for the relief of bedwetting. Each case must be investigated carefully to determine how it should be treated.

In boys it may be, and often is, that circumcision is the remedy indicated. Local congestion from constipation or worms should also be looked into.

In some cases the tone of the nervous system is at fault and must be corrected, this goes with nightmare and sleepwalking.

A little investigation will enable the physician to come to an opinion, follow out definite treatment and get relief.

There are many cases of a nervous origin which are cured by Bromide of Potassium, or small doses of Chloral; other cases are cured by small doses of Belladonna or its alkaloid Liq. Atropinae; Ergot succeeds in some cases through its contraction of the muscles and can be given in ten drop doses night and morning for ten days or two weeks. In cases of a rheumatic tendency the child may have highly acid urine which irritates the bladder and provokes expulsion. This may be relieved by cutting off all meat and giving Bicarbonate of Potash. If the urine is turbid, strong, smells of ammonia, it may be too alkaline, just as provoking to the bladder although an opposite condition. This is not met with so often as the over-acid condition, and can be relieved by dilute phosphoric acid and nux vomica, or salicylate of soda.

In all cases a better habit should be formed by restricting the quantity of drink toward the end of the day, and by arranging it so as to take the child up and have it urinate as late at night as possible and as early as possible in the morning. Long continuance in the bedwetting habit will make the case obstinate, but if an intelligent appreciation of the problem is early brought to bear on each individual case, it will be curable.

I may venture to say that bedwetting is the most unsatisfactory condition that a physician is called upon to treat, because he has not the cooperation of the parents. If a child has pneumonia the parents will take hold and aid in every way, but in bedwetting they expect to get a prescription which will cure at once.

Every case must be studied carefully by physician, urine and stools examined, also rectum for pinworms. If the child is anæmic or nervous, you must build up its general health; if tonsils are diseased, or adenoids present they should be removed, and in some cases this gives relief, not only to bedwetting, but converts a nervous, irritable, unhappy child into a bright happy one.

I repeat myself when I tell you that if your child wets the bed, take a sample of the urine to your physician; take hold with him and try and find out the cause in your child's case.

If you find out the cause, that is half the battle, as the removal or treatment of the cause is simple.

Anyone telling you that a certain remedy will cure all cases is not only deceiving you but themselves.

Subject for next month is Feeding Baby.

Questions and Answers

MEMBRANOUS CROUP.—What is the difference between membranous croup and diptheria? My eighteen-months-old baby became hoarse on Monday, and as she was worse Tuesday I called our physician, who suspected diptheria, took a culture and came Wednesday, said it was diptheria, gave antitoxin, but within an hour baby was dead.

If antitoxin had been given sooner would it have saved her?

Do you have the diptheria germs in membranous croup?

Can diptheria germs be carried in the clothes, and how long will they live?

Mrs. N. M. K., Rensalaer, Ind.

A.—Membranous croup is laryngeal diptheria, where the diptheria germ is located not only in the throat, but in the larynx, trachea and nose, the membrane choking the patient so he can not get air enough.

It is usually treated as sore throat or ordinary croup until it is too late. Anything used successfully in the treatment of membranous croup must be given early in the treatment of the disease, not waiting until the child is cyanosed and struggling for breath.

If not seen until the late stage, the only thing to do is to put a tube into the trachea, so the child can breathe until the antitoxin dissolves the membrane, during the meantime the patient's strength must be kept up by stimulants, preferably brandy. Your baby's chances of living would have been better if the antitoxin had been given earlier, and while the conservative way is to wait until the culture proves the diagnosis, my rule is to give the antitoxin at once in suspected cases if the child seems seriously ill.

Antitoxin properly given will not do any harm, even if the disease is not present, and there will be no after effects unless it is a slight stiffness or soreness of some of the muscles and joints, which soon passes off.

Yes, diptheria germs can be carried in the clothes, the length of time that they will live is a hard question to answer, as it depends so much on their location.

VOMITING BABY.—My nine-months-old baby vomits up his milk every time he takes it, but is very fat, weighing seventeen pounds, while I am very thin and weak.

Mrs. B. H. W., Janesboro, Ark.

A.—Should wean baby at once, not only for his good but your own. Get a bottle of Pepto-Mangan (Gude's) and take dessertspoonfuls in milk three times a day to build up your health.

WEANING BABY—CONSTIPATION.—Should I wean my four-months-old baby, as I am pregnant? What can I do for constipation?

Mrs. G. H. F., Walkersville, W. Va.

A.—Wean baby at once and put her on modified milk.

For the constipation, you should eat lots of fruits and vegetables, and take teaspoonful doses of Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada often enough to keep bowels regular.

FREQUENT URINATION.—TO INCREASE FLOW OF MILK.—What can I do for my two-year-old boy who awakens several times in the night to urinate?

What can I do to increase the amount of my milk?

Is it harmful for my five-months-old baby to sleep ten or twelve hours during the night without a feeding?

Mrs. M. C., Sand Creek, Wyo.

A.—Have your two-year-old boy examined, as he may need circumcision. Do not give him liquids late in the day, and if you are giving much acid fruit, stop them.

You can increase the amount of your milk by drinking lots of liquids, and eating lots of vegetables, especially beets, boiled.

Drink lots of buttermilk, and if this is not available have your druggist get you some Lactone tablets which will convert plain milk into buttermilk.

No harm for baby to sleep all night, and you should be truly thankful that he does.

LIME WATER, MOLASSES COOKIES.—To make lime water, your druggist can give you some tablets which you dissolve in pint of water. This is the better way, or you can take ordinary lime, dissolve it in water, allow to settle, pour off or syphon the liquid.

Molasses Cookies:—One and one-half cups of molasses, sugar one-half cup, half cup of sour milk, cup of butter, or lard, teaspoonful of soda, a little salt, half teaspoonful of ginger, add flour enough to roll.

ACID INDIGESTION.—My two-year-old baby girl does not sleep well, is restless, appetite good, but tongue white, breath smells badly, bowels move three or four times a day, urinates often, and the urine irritates the skin.

Mrs E. M. T., Westminister, Md.

A.—Put this baby on a diet, which should consist largely of milk, adding tablespoonful of lime water to each three ounces of milk. Give her oatmeal gruel and custards, but no acid fruits. Get your druggist to put you up Elix Lactated Pepsin, three ounces, Liq. Bismuth, three ounces, and give her three times a day a teaspoonful of this mixture.

COW'S MILK.—How shall I prepare cow's milk for my six-months-old baby, and shall I have to mix it differently as she grows older?

Mrs. E. P. M., Milford, Del.

A.—Equal parts of milk and water as follows:—milk three ounces, water three ounces, lime water one ounce, sugar of milk one teaspoonful.

Gradually increase the amount of milk until at the ninth month baby is taking pure milk to which has been added a little lime water.

MASTURBATION, BROWN SPOTS.—Will you kindly tell me what ails my fourteen-months-old baby boy, as he gets his legs as close together as he can, then makes his body go up and down? He has done this for seven months and I can not make him stop it, he seems strong and healthy, creeps but does not walk.

Will you please tell me what the brown spots on my face are, and what will remove them?

Mrs. W. P., Intola, Ont., Canada.

A.—Your little boy is masturbating, a vicious harmful habit, and in one so young I think some local condition the cause.

Have him examined by some competent surgeon, and a circumcision performed if needed. If this is not possible, you yourself can push back foreskin and thoroughly wash. Do this if you cause bleeding when you do it for the first time, for without much doubt the secretion under the foreskin is causing this miserable habit.

The brown spots are chloasma uterinum, which occurs in young mothers, and is simply a discoloration of the skin, unattended with alteration of the surface and are caused by the physiological changes in the circulation.

The following lotion will remove them, if persistently used:—Hydrargyrum Chlorididi Corros, 6 Grs; Acidi Acetici, Dil, drams 2; Boracis, scruples, 2; Aquae Rosae, qs, ad, ounces four. Sig.—Apply on spots night and morning, CAUTION:—This should bear poison label.

INDIGESTION.—What can I do for my seven-months-old nursing baby who has indigestion and vomits up its food? My own digestion is not good, and I have slime in my mouth all of the time.

Mrs. L. J. L., Cronfills Gap, Texas.

A.—Get your own digestion in normal condition and the baby's will be the same.

Keep your bowels regular with teaspoonful doses of Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada, taken often enough to keep bowels regular; avoid rich foods, and after meals take two teaspoonfuls doses of Elix Lactated Pepsin.

INJURED PERINEUM.—When my baby was born two months ago, the perineum was so badly torn, that the womb falls so it can be touched from outside. What shall I do?

Mrs. C. S., Ohio.

A.—Go to some competent surgeon and have the perineum repaired at once. Do this before the organs are out of position long enough to prevent a satisfactory result. Do not hurry about getting up after the operation. Support the abdomen, and avoid lifting and reaching for a few months.

CHOREA.—My baby, one year old, was badly constipated and had serious trouble with piles, but these conditions are relieved. She goes through all sorts of motions and winks, can you help me to relieve this?

Mrs. G. F., Hudson Falls, N. Y.

A.—This baby should be removed from all excitement, mental and physica. Many cases improve if kept in a darkened room. Would suggest that you give her two-drop doses of Liquot Potassii arsenitis, also two-drop doses three times a day of Tincture of Chloride of Iron. Your druggist can fill these prescriptions, so that baby can take the two together in syrup, three times a day.

something like gum drops but far better, called locoum. Next we stopped at Dubrovnick, Servia, though we came very near not stopping, as the boat was two days late. Our Captain had a wireless not to stop but four hundred men, women and children talked him into it. Two police from town came on board and wouldn't let us land until morning. It was then after eight o'clock, and he said there was no place for so many to sleep but, when four hundred people all talk at once they get what they want. We went on shore, but only a few of us got rooms and beds. The rest had to sit up all night. The boat company had to pay the town nearly $3,000.00 for being late. We were all tired and hungry as the food on the boat was not so very good. From there we took cabs and went up in the mountains, till we came to our new home. We passed a number of fortresses and trenches that the Austrians used in the war, and saw the ruins of many houses that had been burned.

It was a poor year for this little country as there were no rains until too late to do any good.

If Mrs. Wilkinson doesn't print my letter it will be new to her. I will write more about the ways of this country next time if you care to hear from me.

I am an American but my husband is Montenegrin by birth. Am five feet, seven inches tall, with blue eyes and medium brown hair, weigh 110 pounds and am 24 years old.

It takes a five-cent stamp for letters and two cents on cards and it takes a month for mail to get over here. I would like to have the sisters write me but I cannot promise to answer all.

Your COMFORT sister,

MRS. NIKO NIKCEVICH.

Mrs. Nikcevich.—Please do write again. Foreign letters are so thrilling, don't you think so, sisters?—Ed.

BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

GOOD EVENING SISTERS:

I hope you haven't forgotten me entirely during my absence. Move a little closer together so I can tell you about two events, one short and sweet, and the other long and continuous, which have happened since I visited you.

The first regards Mrs. Wilkinson's visit to Princeton. As I was leaving the East for good she made me a flying visit. By that I don't mean that she came in an areoplane nor has she wings of her own—yet. What I meant was that she came one afternoon and left the next morning which in my estimation was no visit at all. I expect when she does learn to fly she will come out here and stop off just long enough to refill with gas and oil and hurry back to Maine because "that last batch of Sisters' letters must be read." Oh, you have no idea what a responsibility Mrs. Wilkinson's sisters are to her.

The second event was a delightful trip across the continent and my winter here in the "land of sunshine and flowers". As I left Princeton a few days before Christmas I decided to travel by the Washington Sunset Route as I had always wanted to see the southern states in winter time. When we are buried in snow in the North don't you imagine the South as being warm and covered with green foliage and flowers? I did, so you can imagine my surprise to find that all the southern states, until we got into Louisiana, looked very much like our northern states in November. The fields were brown, the trees bare, no flowers and frost on the ground early in the morning. It was all so different from Florida which is quite tropical the year round.

Before I forget I must relate some amusing incidents which occurred on the train. Quite a large party of English people who had just landed in our country were traveling to Los Angeles. Naturally they were loaded down with all kinds of baggage. One young man in particular had his seat loaded to overflowing. When the conductor came through he noticed a valise in the aisle near the man's seat so he said, "You'll have to move that valise as it is against the rules to block the aisle." When he came through again the valise was still there so he tapped the man on the shoulder and said, "Young man, I told you to remove that valise from the aisle," and passed on. The young man still made no move to when the conductor came through the third time he became angry and said, "If you don't remove that valise in one minute I'll pitch it out of the window." The young man looked up and solemnly said, "Go ahead. 'Tis mine."

Near Atlanta a farmer got on the train and beside an elderly lady. As the train was through the open country a peculiar odor came in through the open windows. The lady after minute then turned to the farmer and asked you tell me what that peculiar odor is?" says he, "that's fertilizer." "For the land's sake exclaimed she. "Yes'm," says he.

We reached New Orleans at noon on Christmas Day. I should like to have spent a day in the quaint old city but had to be satisfied with a glimpse I got of it as we went by bus from station to the other on the opposite side of the I won't take the time to describe the trip through Texas, New Mexico and Arizona as the scenery on just level grassy plains became monotonous although the warm dry air was invigorating. saw Mexicans and cowboys lounging around stations which were far apart. Even southern California appeared dry and brown outside of the irrigated districts. It was not until we were on way up to San Francisco that a decided change scenery was noticeable. It was raining and everything looked so fresh and green. By the time reached my destination, just south of Frisco, felt as if I had jumped from December to May the air, the fresh green grass, the many trees reminded me so much of our spring weather home

I had expected to find the spring weather warm here that everyone would be wearing summer dresses. But once again I was disillusioned as people dress here in the winter time nearly in the East. Winter hats, dresses and even coats are worn and one needs them too, for mornings and evenings are always chilly no matter how warm the sunshine is during the day. The thing I don't like about this place is that the houses are not well heated so unless you have a room with a southern exposure you feel colder indoors than outside. It may be better later on as I'm speaking now of January when we are enjoying clear summer weather while the papers tell of blizzards and people freezing in other states. One can't have everything. Even my mother, who wasn't keen about leaving the East, admits that the climate here is almost ideal. So come out, sisters, you won't be disappointed, provided you can make a living here as one can't live on climate alone

I should be very glad to hear from some of the California sisters regarding the climate in other parts of the state, as mother and I hope to locate permanently somewhere in the state as soon as I finish my work here.

Sincerely,

NELLE I. TUCKER.

WACO, CAL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a constant reader of dear old Comfort since I was old enough to read and I am now thirty years of age and the mother of six children. Two

JAMES FRANKLIN LUCE.

14, Laura, 11, Kara, eight, Nicia, six, Jackie, four and my baby Jimmie, as we call him, eight months old. He is the pride of our home. My four oldest all girls, are in school in grades ranging from first to eighth. We live three miles from Waseo, a small town, but at the rate it has grown in the past few years it won't be small long. It has a new grammar school and a high school and children living over two and one-half miles from school are carried there in buses furnished by the state. My girls are the first ones to get on every morning. They have to be ready and out at the front gate by 7:30 for the driver is always on time. The bus they go in has a capacity of 85. The state furnishes all the books in the grammar school. I don't know about the high school. We also have the hot lunch system which is a help to mothers as well as a benefit to the children. I usually make sandwiches, cake, pie, etc. for them and they take their five-cent piece along and get hot soup, beans or whatever suits their taste. They are less likely to hurry through with their meals when they have a bowl of hot soup to eat slowly.

My husband, five of our children and I are natives of Texas. Little James Franklin was born the morning after Christmas and is a native of California. We have been here three years and I am sending his picture to dear old COMFORT and I hope to see him smiling from its pages; for COMFORT is the best paper I ever read and it shall always be in my home as long as I live. He was seven months old when this picture was taken.

LD Colonel Nelson,' who lived in the big old Nelson home in the Upper Town, always went to the cemetery on the twenty-sixth of April and reverently decorated the ves of the Confederate soldiers whose dust l mouldered there for more than half a cen- y.

ld Major Nelson, who resided at Mrs. elps's boarding home for select guests down he Lower Town, waited till the thirtieth of y to walk with much state to the well-kept es Uncle Sam had set apart and made beau- l for his boys who wore the blue, and ced his flowers upon the graves of the ion dead.

The two were brothers, and had been de- ed to each other till their ways had divided ay back in the sixties. Now they were mies, who lived in the same town, went to same church, had the same friends, yet er spoke, never exchanged one kindly nce or had so much as one kind thought for h other.

'A traitor to his country is no longer a broth- of mine," old Major Nelson declared rcely, when any well-meaning person ven- ed to approach him with offers of media- n.

And the Colonel would say, with equal terness, "a traitor to his State, sir, is be- th the contempt of any right-minded per- . I do not care to hear that—er—indi- ual's name mentioned again."

They were very old men, but well-kept and e, likely to live for some years yet, when year 1921 approached its mid-youth, it ng at this time, the twenty-ninth of May.

On the evening of this day the Colonel, who s a childless widower, sat in his library be- e the enormous old fireplace wherein huge s were wont to be piled in wintertime; now re was just a bit of a blaze, for the evening s chilly for old bones. Above the mantel serenely noble face of Lee looked down upon , flanked on either side by the grave face Stonewall Jackson and the laughing one of eb" Stuart. Washington's dignified coun- ance hung just above Lee's portrait, and r all was draped the folds of a red-and- ite banner—the Stars and Bars of the dead l gone Confederacy.

Old Antony, an aged negro with wool as ite as snow, came shuffling into the library h a tray whereon was set a deep, smoking of black coffee and a plate of crullers; s was the Colonel's dessert, always taken is.

Old Antony placed the tray on a tiny, rose- od tabouret at the Colonel's elbow and stood pectfully awaiting further orders from his ster. Antony was a "Nelson nigger"—he l belonged to the family, and, moreover, he l been Colonel Nelson's body-servant all ough the war; more than once he had saved young master's life, and the two old men re devoted friends; Antony would gladly ve laid down his life for his master, and the lonel would have given up his own for his vant any day.

Suddenly the knocker on the hall door ttered loudly; Antony went out and pres- ly returned with the Reverend Stuart kenzie, the Colonel's rector.

'This is kind, sir," welcomed the Colonel ng to his feet and shaking the clergyman's nd, "I was very lonely, very lonely indeed. tony, fetch another cup."

But the minister declined coffee; he was a nervous, and rubbed his hand before the ze in an absent-minded manner. At last spoke.

'Ahem! Colonel, I—er—seeing that to- rrow we—er—expect to honor the heroic d who gave up their lives in France for the e of the world——"

'Sake of fiddlesticks!" sniffed the Colonel, lan, any red-blooded nation would have e in at the beginning. We waited too long, —entirely too long!"

'Be that as it may," conceded the minister. is now a time when we all ought to forget d and gone animosities, and make friends. lonel, won't you join us at the National metery tomorrow? Your nephew, John ison, fell over there, you know."

'Certainly, I know John fell bravely—and st unnecessarily, poor chap! Day the ar- stice was signed. Left a widow in France— rried over there to a nice girl; writes to me— le boy named Jack. What's that got to with me going to your Yankee graveyard? ill not, sir! Pardon me, but I think there something underhanded in this request— l really want me to see—and perhaps speak a man who betrayed his native State, sir. efuse to do it, with all due deference to rself, sir!"

Reverend Mr. McKenzie rose. "The God battles soften your heart, sir, for I perceive t it is beyond my power," he said, and ched for his stick and hat, which he had d on a chair, "I bid you good-evening, lonel!"

'A good man, Antony, but a meddling old l," the Colonel informed Antony, when he ne back from ushering out the minister. etch me another cup of coffee—this is cold. —I don't want any; that meddling preacher spoiled my appetite for dessert—take the llers away, and reach me that History of Confederacy on the high shelf."

While the Colonel composed his mind in the es of the history of the Lost Cause, the jor sat in his own private sitting-room at s. Phelps's boarding home for Select Guests. h his own lares and penates about him. ncoln looked down with sad, humorous s upon the old gentleman, who was read- the daily paper. Grant and Sherman arded him with indifferent, set faces from ir station on either side of Lincoln. Over three the Flag, radiant and starry, hung its tecting folds.

A knock on his door caused the Major to k up from his paper and call, "come in!" her impatiently—he was an old bachelor, Major, and set in his ways; and he did not to be interrupted while reading his eve- g paper.

The door opened and an elderly gentleman ample girth and kindly face entered—Dr. ymond, the physician of both the Major d Colonel Nelson.

'Nobody sick in the house, Jack?" queried Major, as the doctor dropped into a chair his side.

"Nobody—physically," smiled the doctor, "most of us are crazy you know, except 'thee and me,' and sometimes—'I think thee is'," finished the Major; "what's up, Jack?"

"Tomorrow, Major, we go to decorate the graves of those soldiers who died in France, and whose bodies have been, very rightly, laid away with the nation's old heroes of the sixties."

"When their folks let 'em be laid there," added the Major, "where they belong. My nephew, John Allison, left a widow in France, poor chap—killed at the last minute. Got a fine kid, too. She sent me his picture."

"Seeing that tomorrow will be—er—rather unusual in its ceremonies," began the doctor, "I wonder if you couldn't open your heart and make friends with the Colonel for the sake of Jack Allison, if nothing else?"

"Sir," said the Major, with dignity, "you are my friend, and I cannot be rude to you in my—er—room. But I will say this: I make no friends at this late day with a traitor to his Country! And, unless you change the subject, I'll bid you good-evening!"

"Sleep on it, Major, sleep on it!" advised the doctor, but he rose, sadly shaking his head as he went out—there was small chance of the Major's conversion. "Butt-headed old idiots, both of them," thought the doctor, as he left Mrs. Phelps's premises.

"Meddling young whippersnapper," fumed the Major, as he turned for comfort to his paper—and did not find it!

Neither did the Colonel find much comfort in his beloved History; he turned the pages, looked at the pictures of the battles, and sighed restlessly—the minister had spoiled his evening, even as the doctor had ruined the Major's. A long, shrill whistle sounded—the eastern passenger train was coming in, on time, for a wonder. Taxis began to rattle along the cobbles of the street, and the Colonel frowned at their unseemly noise. Now one, a bit noisier than its fellows, stopped at the gate——

"Now who the devil can that be?" thought the Colonel, irritably, he had had enough company—wanted no more for the evening.

But presently the door opened, and this time old Antony and Sabry, his wife, who was the Colonel's housekeeper and cook, both ushered in guests—a lady all in black and a little boy whose sleepy blue eyes and freckled little nose looked vaguely familiar to the Colonel—he had known a child who looked like that, somewhere.

"Thiz ees my Oncle?" said a sweet voice, hesitatingly, and the little lady in black threw back her veil and disclosed a sweet, dark, foreign little face, "voila—I am Marie, your niece, and thiz is mon enfant—my leetle Jack!" And quite promptly, she threw herself into the Colonel's outstretched arms and sobbed whole-heartedly on his tucked shirt-front.

"Why, honey, I'm mighty glad to see you—mighty glad! And the boy too—Jack's image, ma'am—his spittin' image! Knew him at a glance. But why didn't you write me you were coming, honey?"

He was gently removing the bonnet and veil, handing them to Sabry, who, with Antony, was giving vent to mingled exclamations of sorrow and delight—sorrow for Jack, whom they had known since childhood, delight at seeing his little boy, and his widow.

"Fix the big room upstairs, Sabry," ordered the Colonel, "and fetch out the trundle-bed from the garret for the boy. Shake hands with the servants, honey—they knew your husband, and they are glad to see you and the boy."

The little lady turned, confronted old Sabry, with tears in her kind old eyes, and hurled herself on Sabry's broad bosom like a small whirlwind.

"You are both of ze hearts so kind," she sobbed, and the Colonel felt vaguely relieved when she took old Antony's hand, having an idea that perhaps she might embrace him, too!

Then the little boy was brought forward, and petted, and hugged and made much over by the old servants. And, when they were all a little composed, the Colonel took the little chap in his lap, and heard his niece's story of how, wishing to see her dear husband's people and country, she had come over for a short visit—she would return soon to her own France, and her own parents.

"And he—he lies in our land,' but I am glad zat I get here in time to put flowers on ze graves of ze vieux soldats— ze ones in your town. Tomorrow we go, Jack, and you and I, and place zem."

Proudly she showed a long box, which she opened and showed filled with wonderfully fresh and fair blossoms from a city florist's.

"I stop and get zem," she said, "but now I see roses, roses, everywhere. In ze morning early I gazzer zem, yes?"

"Yes—oh, yes," said the Colonel, absently, and found himself wondering how on earth he would go about refusing her request to accompany her to the Yankee cemetery!

When he arose next morning he found her up and gathering armfuls of roses and every other blooming thing from his garden. The first time in all its history that the old bushes had given of their store to the State's enemies!

Then, without his own volition, the Colonel found himself, his arms full of blossoms, walking meekly beside Marie of France, with her arms full, and Jack with his small hands clutching a big bunch of roses, while behind old Antony followed solemnly, bearing the rest. And they were going, without doubt, to the National Cemetery, and these Confederate blossoms would decorate Yankee graves and be laid upon them by the Colonel's own hands!

The Colonel was too dazed to talk—to think, even; he heard Marie's softly sweet voice prattling about "ze ozzer oncle—we meet heem zere, doubtless?"

"Yes," said the Colonel, shortly, "doubtless."

"But you—you are Oncle Jack, and I love you best," whispered the soft voice, "ze ozzer—what hees name?"

"Jim," uttered the Colonel, shortly—how long it had been since he had spoken his brother's name!

"He, too is ze old one—soldat?" trilled the sweet voice, and again the Colonel answered briefly—"yes!"

"You weel pont heem out, so wee met heem? My boy must know—you weel show heem to us?" she asked, eagerly, and the miserable colonel bowed, in his distress, forgetting that old Antony heard, and was, doubtless, grinning at his master's discomfiture!

But no; old Antony was whispering, "praise de Lord God!" under his breath, but very, very fervently. Antony loved them both, and, privately, was very friendly to the Major, whenever they met abroad.

They entered the gates; the Colonel listened to her delighted whispers about the so beautiful place, in silence. Silently they marched with the crowd, and laid their offerings on the graves. The Colonel knew that the townsfolk were wondering—it was a great day, and the whole town was present to hear the address which would include in its praises the soldiers who had recently given their lives for their country, across the ocean—the dead who had lain in France.

It was a great oration, made by one of the country's eminent speakers, and the Colonel found himself listening, enthralled—and against his wish—to the words. But it was not the speaker's oratory that clutched his heart-strings, but the small boy, Jack, piping shrilly, at the end, when the crowd was dispersing: "Maman, where is our Oncle Jeem?"

"But our Oncle Jack will show us, petit," she whispered, and the poor Colonel, standing erect, his "eyes front," did not see old Antony lean over, touch the lady on the shoulder and point to the Major—the last figure, as it happened, in the procession!

Neither did he see small Jack rush forward, at his mother's whisper, take the amazed Major by the hand, and pipe bravely that "maman" wanted to see him—come!

Obediently the Major turned, and allowed the child to take him to the little group beside a tree—all alone. The Major could not tell what it all meant—he had seen them, and his mind was still too dazed to comprehend the Colonel's change of heart—if such were the case. The Major knew something unheard of had happened, to make Jack come—and in his thoughts he, too, spoke the name that his lips had not uttered for so long—so long!

In a moment more, and the little widow had fluttered forth from the Colonel's side, and that gentleman was saying, "Jack's widow—and his boy." The Colonel was actually speaking to the Major!

Followed soft words, explanations, and then, when the Major had kissed them both, and praised the boy as being "the spittin' image of Jack," what did Marie of France do but link her arms through the arms of the Colonel and the Major and quietly proceed to lead them forth!

"We shall all go to Oncle Jack's, and I shall tell you, too, about my brave soldat in France," she whispered, with tears in her dark eyes, and the two followed lamblike! Being gentlemen, what else could they do?

And now old Antony uttered his thanksgiving so loud that they nearly heard him!

At the gate of the house—the old Nelson place, where both had been born and reared till their pitifully young manhood, when they were severed by war, the Major paused, but the Colonel said, very quietly, "Come in, Jim—and welcome."

Then the Major reached forth his hand, and when the two stood, hand clasped in hand, old Antony shouted his pæan, loud and triumphantly, so that both brothers, wheeling, saw him with the tears of age creeping down his furrowed old face.

"Jack," said the Major, huskily, "I've been a darned old fool—forgive me!"

"Jim," said the Colonel, and his voice was also husky, "I was the older, and the darnedest fool of the two! Come home, boy—come home to stay!"

"Ah," smiled Marie, "Americains are so funnce—my Jack was so. Call each ozzer ze 'darned fool' because you love each ozzer, is it not?"

In the library came bustling old Sabry, warned by Antony, bearing cordial in thin old glasses that had belonged to the mother of the Nelsons, and poundcake on a silver tray that had borne its burden of "company cake" when they were in the nursery.

The Colonel poured for all—the drink was only berry-juice and harmless for the boy—and stood for a moment, his eyes on his brother's wrinkled old face.

"Jim," said the Colonel, solemnly, "we will drink a toast: 'To Our Country, one and indivisible, now and forever'!"

"Praise de Lord God, Amen!" shouted old Antony, from the doorway, and the hearts of the brothers silently echoed his thanksgiving as they drank—the Nelson feud was ended!

LIGHTWEIGHT ICELAND WOOL SWEATER. NO. 1.

RING WOOL SLIP-ON. NO. 2.

TUXEDO WITH LIGHT WOOLLY COLLAR AND CUFF. NO. 3.

NAVAJO OR INDIAN SWEATER. NO. 4.

New Hand-Made Sweaters

FROM among the bewildering array of new sweaters we have selected a few which feature some of the latest ideas, and are also practical undertakings for the hand knitter.

The colors this spring are brilliant and the combinations striking.

Wool sweaters of both light and heavy weight hold first place, then the fiber silk and silk which cost more.

Sweaters of one color show allover designs or borders of fancy stitches, or patterns are worked with two or more colors darned into the finished garments. Drop-stitch patterns are popular and a new feature in wool garments are those turned or made of ring or astrakhan wool.

Nos. 1, 2 and 3 are light weight sweaters.

In No.1 the blocking off may be very easily accomplished by knitting as directed, or if one prefers two or more colors can be run in by hand to form the blocks after the knitting is completed.

Blocks running crosswise to form a diamond design could also be used on such a garment as this.

No. 2 is a very easily made and new slip-on sweater of ring wool with a bordered bottom which can be omitted if one prefers. This model is also very smart worked of white ring wool with black ring wool stripes running around. To make in this way copy sweater No. 1 omitting stripes running up and down.

No. 3 is an easy to slip on and especially pretty sweater featuring a wide collar and cuffs of ring wool.

Brush wool which is also very popular could be substituted as effectively.

Sweater No. 4 is a simple Indian design which can be worked in as the garment is made, or the stripes can be knitted in and the diamonds darned in by hand.

Nos. 5 and 6 on the next page are blouse models, No. 5 being crocheted of fiber silk and No. 6 a knitted drop-stitch pattern which is very pretty.

Blocked Iceland Wool Sweater

Gage: Of materials used count number of stitches given to the inch, garments will be the size given. To make larger add the number of stitches needed for each inch, smaller, drop this number of stitches. For instance in this garment add or drop six stitches for an inch difference in size, 11 sts for two inches.

Materials required—Three balls white Iceland, one ball nile-green, one pair No. 6 amber or celluloid needles, one pair No. 12 steel needles.

Gage 6 sts to inch gives size 36.

With double Iceland cast on 104 sts for back. K plain for 8 ridges or 16 rows.

17th row—Using green k 1 row.

19th row—Pick up white, k 14 sts.

Wind 4 small balls each of 10 yard strands of green to use in strips running up and down. K 1 green st. K 24 white sts, 1 green st 24 white, 1 green, 24 white, 1 green, ending row with 14 white sts.

20th row—P 14 white, * 1 green 24 white, * repeat from * to * twice more, ending row with p 14 white. Repeat these 2 rows 26 more times. Then repeat 17th and 18th rows using green. This completes the pattern.

Work 4 more patterns, making 5 rows of blocks

Cut off 10 strands green of 2 yards each for stripes in sleeves. Cast on 86 sts for each sleeve (unless shorter sleeve is desired), then omit sts for one or more blocks, or a half, just as is needed, measuring length by work already completed.

On the full width now work to the next crosswise stripe of green, and then 14 rows. Now count and mark off with pins the 54 center sts, continue to follow pattern in the next 10 rows, but on the 54 sts k 2, p 2. Next row bind off center 40 sts for neck, slip sts worked on holder. K and p 6 sts, work to end of sleeve. Work 3 rows, always knitting and purling 6 sts at the neck. Work green strip, slip these sts on holder, work other side to correspond. Cast on 40 sts for neck, pick up balance of sts. Continue to follow pattern, knitting 2, purling 2 across front.

Complete b ock and 15 rows of next block, then bind off number of stitches cast on for sleeves. Finish front to match the back.

Cuffs

With steel needles pick up 60 sts on ends of sleeves and k 2, p 2 for 4 inches or desired length, bind off easily.

Sew up sides of sweater from bottom to wrists being careful to match the stripes as perfectly as possible.

Ring Wool Slip-On

Gage: 3 sts to inch, size 36.

Materials required. E ght to nine ounces white ring wool. One ball white and one ball colored Shetland wool or fiber silk. One pair No. 6 needles, one pair No. 12 steel needles.

Using white ring wool cast on 54 sts for back, work loosely to secure soft woolly effect.

Knit 10 rows. * k 1 row of white Shetland, k 2 rows of colored Shetland, 1 row of white Shetland *.

In making the border do not break the yarn at the end of the rows. Drop white Shetland and k 4 rows of ring wool. Drop this and repeat work from * to *.

Then 4 rows ring wool, repeat from * to * again and break Shetland.

With ring wool continue to knit until work measures 16 to 18 inches according to length of sweater desired, measuring from armpits downward.

Cast on 50 sts for sleeve. K across, cast on 50 sts, k for 5½ inches, turn. K 66 sts, hold together on end of needle, bind off 22 sts loosely for neck, continue across row, turn.

On 66 sts k 4 rows. Break wool, join at neck end and k 4 rows on 66 sts on second sleeve. Cast on 26 sts for front of neck, join to other side and continue to knit across full width for 5 inches.

Starting at wrist end bind off 50 sts, k across and bind off 50 sts. Finish front of sweater to correspond with back.

Cuffs

Pick up 45 sts, using white Shetland and steel needles and k 3 sts, p 3 sts for 4 inches, bind off. Sew up seams of sweater with white Shetland.

Girdle

Twist or braid strands of Shetland and finish with tassels of white and the color used in border.

Tuxedo Sweater

Gage: Six stitches to inch, size 36.

Materials required. Ten ounces of Shetland floss, two balls ring wool, one pair No. 6 amber needles, one small crochet hook and two wooden button molds size of a quarter.

Cast on 84 sts for the back, k plain for 10 rows.

11th row—K 1 * k 2 sts tog, o, repeat from * ending row with o, k 1.

12th row—P 5, * k 2, p 10 * repeat from * to * ending row with p 5.

13th row—K 5, * p 2, k 10 * repeat from * to *, ending row with k 5. Repeat these last rows until the back measures 18 inches.

Sleeves

Cast on 19 sts, turn work pattern across and cast on 19 sts. Repeat casting on 19 sts at beginning of next 3 rows, then 27 at beginning of next 3 rows, than 27 at begining of next row, or 65 sts in all for each sleeve.

Work pattern until width is 5 inches at elbow or before 27 sts were added. Turn and work 96 sts, slip on holder or extra needle, bind off 22 sts for neck, work remaining 96 sts for 8 rows.

Now add 1 st every other row at neck for 20 rows (20 added sts), bind off sleeve when it measures same as back of sleeve, by binding off 65 sts loosely.

Continue working pattern on the front until work measures 6 inches from sleeve on under-arm side, then always knit 10 sts on center front to form border, otherwise following the pattern.

Finish with border on bottom of the front to match the back, bind off loosely. Work other side in the same way. Seam up sides.

Collar and Cuffs

These may be of ring wool, brush wool or Shetland wool looped and crocheted on a dark sweater; collar and cuffs of either white or gray wool are especially smart. Of ring wool cast on 18 sts for the collar, using No. 6 needles and knit easily f9r 40 or 45 inches, bind off and sew in place. For cuffs cast on 25 sts, k 10 inch band, sew up and sew to sleeves.

Crocheted Collar

If one wishes to, a soft woolly collar which will be similar in effect, may be made by winding wool around a pencil several times and then crocheting off the loops.

Begin with ch 5 inches long, turn, 1 s c in each st, turn, 1 s c * wind loops, crochet off. 1 s c, repeat from * for length needed.

Loops wound 3 times may be worked into each single, or if more loops are used work in every other st with a plain single between.

Belt

On No. 6 or smaller needles knit belt inch and one-half wide by length desired.

Begin by knitting 10 rows, then k only one-half the sts for 10 rows. K balance sts for 10 rows, slip all together and k to end. Make second buttonhole, k 10 rows and bind off.

For buttons see Drop Stitch Surplice Sweater on the next page.

Navajo Sweater

Gage: 11 sts to two inches, size 36.

Materials required. Seven balls Shetland floss of main color used, 1 ball each of contrasting colors, 1 pair amber needles No. 6.

Sweater illustrated is of tan, with diamonds of scarlet and navy.

Cast on 92 sts for lower edge of back using tan. Knit 20 rows for border. K 1 row, p 1 row for 7 rows before beginning diamond of which there are 7. For these cut 7 strands of scarlet, each 1½ yards long, fold in half. In knitting next row as given k the first st of scarlet forming point of each diamond from the center of a scarlet strand.

8th row—K 6 sts tan, 1 st scarlet *12 sts tan, 1 st scarlet, repeat from * until 7 strands have been worked in, end with 7 tan.

9th row—P 6 tan, 1 scarlet (carrying in front of st), * 1 tan, 1 scarlet using half of first strand, 10 tan, repeat from * each diamond, ending row with 5 tan

10th row—K 4 tan, 1 scarlet, * 3 tan, 1 scarlet, 8 tan, repeat from *.

11th row—Purl, working 5 sts across monds and 6 sts between.

12th row—K 2 tan, 1 scarlet, 3 tan, 7 navy strands ¾ yards each, from each a strand, k 1 navy st, 3 tan, 1 scarlet, * 1 scarlet, 3 tan, 1 navy, 3 tan, 1 scarlet, repeat from * across, ending with 3 tan.

13th row—* P 2 tan, 1 scarlet, 3 tan, 1 tan, 1 navy, 3 tan, 1 scarlet, repeat from across, ending with 1 tan.

14th row—* K 1 scarlet, 3 tan, 1 navy, 1 navy 3 tan, 1 scarlet, repeat from * ending with 1 tan beyond scarlet.

15th row—P 2 tan, 1 scarlet, 3 tan, 1 tan, 1 navy, 3 tan, 1 scarlet. Repeat.

17th, 18th, 19th and 20th rows—Same as 11th, 10th, 9th and 8th rows, thus completing the first row of diamonds.

Leave loose ends of the colors and completing the knitting, thread each darn in on the wrong side.

Knit and purl 9 rows of tan, k 2 rows scarlet, 2 rows navy, 2 rows scarlet. K and p 9 rows tan.

Work a second row of diamonds, 1 row tan, the knitted rows of scarlet, navy scarlet, 9 rows tan, third row of diamonds to center, then cast on 44 sts on each side sleeves, Complete the diamonds for and sleeves plain of k and p.

Follow diamonds with 9 rows of tan knitted rows of scarlet, navy and scarlet rows of tan.

Next begin another row of diamonds working 1 scarlet in the 13th st, 6 tan diamonds, 12 sts apart, then 31 tan sts, diamonds on second sleeve.

Work 3 more rows across both sleeves, next row work 72 sts, slip on extra needle, bind off 36 sts for the neck, work 72 sts. Work 3 rows on 72 sts, working diamonds as usual. Complete 3 rows on 72 sts on third needle, next row, work 72 sts, cast on 36 sts, work 72 sts. The center row of the 5 diamonds in the sleeves marks one-half of the sweater.

Work the front the same as the back, binding off stitches for the sleeves loosely when these are complete.

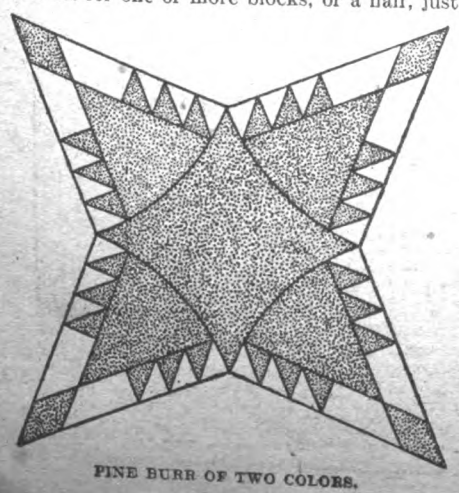
Cuffs

Pick up sts in ends of sleeves. K and 4 rows, work 4 diamonds then k 10 rows and bind off.

To finish neck with tan pick up 2 sts on shoulder 36 across front, 2 on shoulder, 14 rows, bind off.

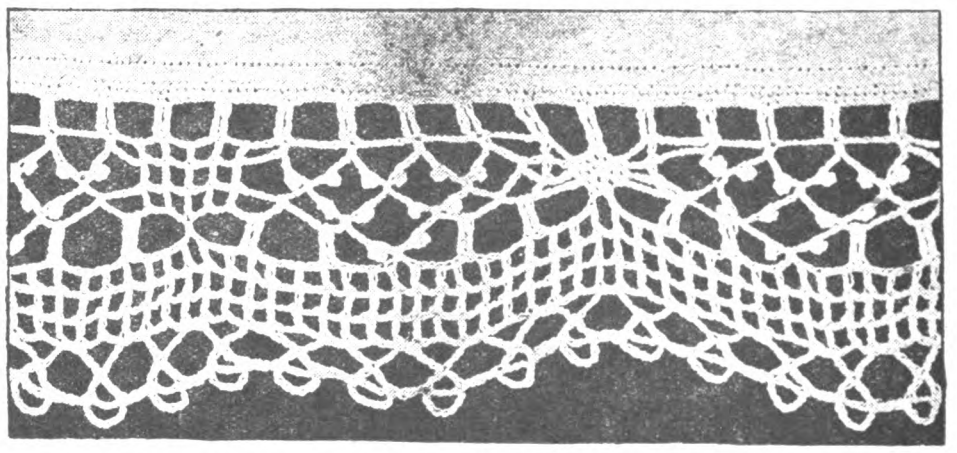
Work across back in same way and join on the shoulder.

Quilt Blocks



As many of our readers have been unable to cut patterns from looking at the illustrations of the actual work which we have been publishing recently, we hope the drawings which we have had made of a few designs will be clearer.

These illustrations show very definitely the shape of each piece, and indicate the number of colors or different materials which can be used in their making.



This seems to be the best we can do to assist workers in copying designs as we cannot furnish patterns of any quilt blocks.

Little Girl's Jumper Dress

Five-year size.

MATERIALS required. Five balls primrose Shetland floss, one bone crochet hook, which will make 15 sts in chaining to the inch.

This little dress is as easily made as it is attractive and practical. The finished dress worked with these materials not loosely, but with an easy tension will measure about as follows: Length from shoulder 23 inches. Width across front at bottom of yoke 18 inches. Width around bottom 40 inches.

A larger or smaller dress can be easily planned by allowing a difference of 5 sts for each inch.

Begin by ch 101 sts for bottom of the back of the dress.

1st row—1 d c in 3rd st from hook, 6 d c in next sts, * ch 3, 1 d c in 4th st, ch 3, 1 d c in 4th st, 6 d c in next 6 sts, repeat from * ending with 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

2nd row—1 d c on d c. ch 3, 7 d c on 7 d c, repeat across, ch 5, turn.

3rd row—1 d c on 4th d c, ch 3, 1 d c on 7th d c, * 2 d c under ch 3, 1 d c on d c, 2 d c under next ch 3, 1 d c on d c, ch 3, 1 d c on 4th d c, ch 3, 1 d c on 7th d c, repeat from * across, ch 3, turn.

4th row—7 d c, 2 blks, over blks.

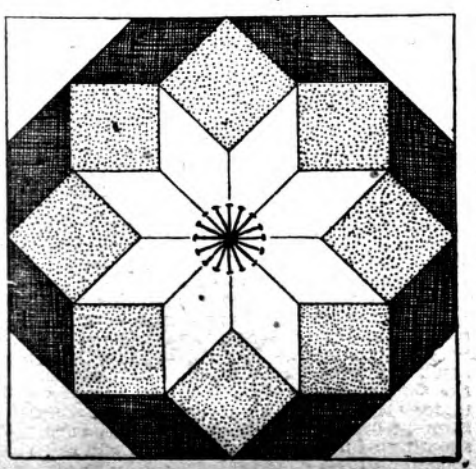
5th and 6th rows—Same as 1st and 2nd rows.

7th row—2 chs, 3 sts over each group of 7 doubles and 2 chs 3 over each group of 2 blocks, ch 3, turn.

8th row—1 s c under ch 3, ch 3, 1 s c under next ch, always ch 3 at end of each row, turn. Repeat last row until work measures without stretching 15 inches including the border.

About 4 rows of chs should count to the inch. Now count the chains in the next row, work to center ch, ch 3, turn. 1 s c under last ch, work back and forth on this half of the work until this side measures 19 inches.

In the next row work starting from the side edge and working towards the center, ch to within 5 chs of the center edge or in other words do not work over 5 chs counting in from the center edge, turn work to side edge, turn work over same chs as in last row, then 7 d c over 2 of the 5 chs, 2 blks over next 2 chs, 4 d c over 5th ch. This brings one to the center edge in the middle of the back, ch 3, turn.



Next row—4 d c, 2 blks, 7 d c, chs to end. Now as will be seen extra rows of chs have to be worked to equal 1 row of the border.

Across the shoulder now work on the chs and over 7 d c of the border work 2 blks, then 7 d c and 2 more blks. This brings one to the 2 blks on the side above the front border.

Work the other side of the back in the same way to this point. After working the 2 blks in the border, ch 21 sts and join to the neck side of blks on the first side completed.

Now work from side to side of the work, completing the square neck with 7 d c, 2 blks, 7 d c, 2 blks, 7 d c for two rows.

When front equals length of back, work the block border.

DESIGN FOR LIGHT AND DARK PIECES.

CROCHETED SILK BLOUSE.

DROP STITCH SLIP-ON.

Sleeves

Folding the dress together evenly, measure from the shoulders downward on the side edges. Mark these points of both the front and back of the dress. Along the 12-inch space on each side the sleeves are worked.

Join the wool at point marked, ch 3, 1 s c in end chains on edge, repeat working extra chains across top of shoulder to give added fullness to the little puff sleeves.

Ch back and forth for three inches, in next row only ch to within three inches of edge, then turn and work back.

Work three full rows. Next row work to within three inches of edge, turn, work to within three inches of opposite edge.

Turn work to within 3 inches of edge, work 1 full row, work 1 row skipping chs enough to make the number 42, turn work, 1 blk, 7 d c, 2 blks, 7 d c, 2 blks, 7 d c, 1 blk, repeat, making second sleeve in exactly the same way.

Tie little dress together by lacing up the back with a cord finished with small tassels.

It is as well to make this dress a little short rather than just the length as it will grow in length from one to two inches with wear. Seam up sides and sleeves being careful to match row to row of the border.

Crocheted Silk Blouse

Size 36-38.

Material required. One pound fiber or sweater silk, one No. 2 crochet hook.

First work the band of insertion which may be of any pattern one fancies. To copy work shown—begin with ch 26, turn, sl st into 9th st from hook, ch 5, sl st into next 4th st, repeat making 5 loops in all. Ch 5, turn.

2nd row—Sl st into 1st loop, ch 5, repeat, ch 5, turn.

3rd row—Sl st into 1st loop, ch 5, 1 shell, 5 d c, in center st next loop, ch 1, 1 shell in next loop, ch 5, sl st in next loop, ch 5, sl st last loop, ch 5, turn.

4th row—Sl st into 1st loop, ch 5, sl st in next loop, ch 5, 1 shell under ch 1 between shells in last row, ch 5, sl st in next loop, ch 5, sl st in last loop, ch 5, turn.

Repeat from 1st row for 23-inch strip. Make a second strip of insertion 25 or more inches long for the front.

Back

Along top edge of insertion work 1 s c, ch 2, 1 d c in end ch of insertion, ch 2, 1 s c, ch 2, 1 d c, repeat. In center of back work singles and doubles nearer together to give a bit of fullness to the upper part of the blouse.

2nd row—Chs of 2, with a single on a double in the 1st row a double on a single. Always turn with ch 5, when ending a row with a single.

Work until back measures 10 inches. Ch 55 sts for sleeve. Break silk, ch 55 sts from opposite. Break thread. Join at beginning of a ch. If st on back was a single ch 2 and work 1 double or vice versa. Break thread. Work pattern on second ch, turn and work across the full width until work measures eight to nine inches.

Fold and mark center of the back; from this point measure three and one-half inches toward sleeves. Mark these points. From edge of sleeve work back and forth to one of these points until work measures six inches from shoulder.

1st row of increase—On neck edge after last s c or d c, ch 5, turn (if st was a double work a single on it), complete row as usual.

2nd row—On neck edge, work last st under end ch 5, ch 5, turn. Work 1 st on st under the ch 5 in 1st row of increase. Repeat the last two rows until one-half the number of chs across the back of the neck, plus 4 chs have been added. For example: If neck counts 18 to 20 chs add 9 or 10 plus 4.

Work until front of sleeve equals back of sleeve to shoulder, then omit sleeve chs and work on front until work measures 14 inches from shoulder. Complete other side to this point. Finish front allow it from one to two inches longer than back. Sew to front band of insertion arranging any fullness to the sides of the center front. Sew up sides.

Work one row of singles around lower edge of insertion.

Sleeve Finish

1 row of s c, ch 2, turn.
2nd row—1 s c, ch 1, skip 1, 1 s c.
3rd row—Same as 2nd row.

Neck Finish

1 row chains 2 with 1 s c in end chains of rows, being careful not to draw the work up too much. Just work the singles where they come best to make a straight even neck line.

2nd row—1 s c in each st.
3rd row—1 s c, ch 1, skip 1, 1 s c.
4th row—Same as 3rd row.

Drop Stitch Surplice Sweater

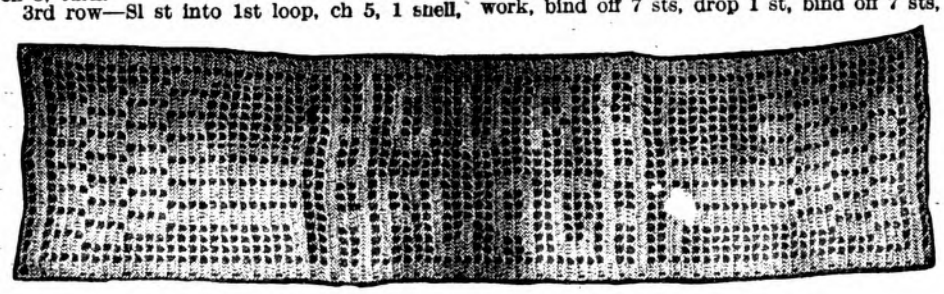
Use 5 sts to inch. Size 36-38.

Materials required. Six balls Shetland floss or nine ounces fiber silk, 1 pair No. 3 knitting needles.

The open work stripes which run lengthwise are made by dropping a stitch and letting it run down the entire length of the work.

Begin by casting on 55 sts of Shetland or 65 of silk, for the back, this will of course be wider when the stitches are dropped and pulled out.

Knit plain until back measures 10 or 12 inches according to how long garment should be from armpit to waist.



Cast on 40 sts (50 of silk), for sleeves. K across, cast on for second sleeve. K for 22 ridges, turn, k 60 sts and slip on extra needle, bind off 3 sts, drop 1 st off the needle, bind off 7 sts (this marks center of the back), drop 1 st, bind off 3 sts, k remaining 60 sts. Turn.

Work 4 ridges (8 rows) on 60 sts. Now increase 1 st at the neck edge for 22 ridges.

Next row starting at the sleeve end of work bind off 7 sts, drop 1 st, bind off 7 sts, drop 1 st, bind off 7 sts, drop 1 st, bind off 7 sts, drop 1 st. Work on the remaining sts for 40 ridges adding 1 st every other row at neck edge.

Last row, starting on under arm edge of work, bind off 7 sts, drop 1 st, bind off 7 sts, drop 1, bind off remaining sts. Knit the other side in exactly the same way.

After the garment is complete, pull each of the dropped stitches out through the entire length of the work.

FILET FLAG DESIGN.

Belt

Cast on 24 sts and knit 28 to 30 inches long. When practically long enough make 2 buttonholes as follows: K 5 sts, bind off 5 sts, k 5, bind off 5, k 4.

Next row—K 4, cast on 5 sts, k 5, cast on 5, k 5, K 5 ridges, bind off.

Buttons

Ch 3, join in ring, fill ring with singles, work round and round, adding sts as needed. Slip over wooden button mold. Work a couple of rounds skipping every third st to draw covering in, break thread leaving an end to finish with and sew button in place.

Filet Flag Design

Begin with ch 63 sts, turn.

1st row—1 d c in 4th, 5th and 6th sts from hook, ch 2, sk 2, 1 d c (1 sp), 17 more sps, 4 d c, ch 3, turn.

2nd row—1 d c on each d c, 2 d c under each ch 2, ch 3, turn.

3rd row—Same as 1st row.

4th row—1 blk, 1 sp, repeat 7 times, then 3 sps, 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

5th and 6th row—Blks and sps over blks and sps in 4th row.

7th row—1 blk, 3 sps, * 1 blk, 1 sp, repeat from * 6 times, then 1 sp, 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

8th, 9th and 10th rows—Blks and sps over those in 7th row.

11th row—1 blk, 2 sps, * 1 blk, 1 sp, repeat from * 6 times, then 2 sps, 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

12th, 13th and 14th rows—Blks and sps over those in 11th row.

15th row—1 blk, * 1 sp, 1 blk, repeat from * 6 times, 4 sps, 1 blk.

16th, 17th and 18th rows—Blks and sps over those in 15th row.

19th row—1 blk, ch 2 (2 d c, ch 1, 1 d c), over next sp, 5 sps (2 d c, ch 1, 1 d c), over next sp, 1 sp, * 1 blk, 1 sp, repeat from * twice, 3 sps, 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

In 7 next rows work blks and sps over those in 19th row, making 2 doubles in 2nd and 8th sps.

27th row—1 blk, 9 sps worked as in last row. 1 blk, 1 sp. 1 blk, 1 sp, 4 blks, 1 sp, 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

Boy's Knicker Suit

Five-year size.

Materials required: Three hanks of heather mixture Scotch knitting yarn, 4 ounces plain color for bands, 1 pair No. 2 amber needles, 1 pair No. 5 amber and 1 pair No. 12 steel needles, 2 small wooden button molds.

For the Knickers

Cast on 80 sts using No. 2 needles. Make knitted band which will fit closely about the waist by k 2, p 2 for 2 inches. Then k 1 row p 1 row using No. 5 needles for 10 rows. Now increase 1 st at the beginning of each row until 10 sts have been added to each side. K and p until one has 50 rows below the ribbing.

Mark each edge of the work with a thread at this point.

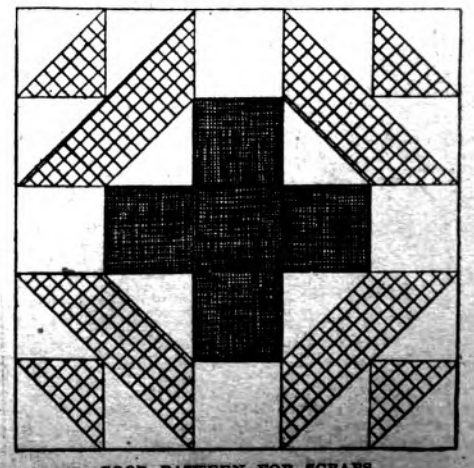
One now begins to decrease to get the width for the leg.

1st row of decrease—Bind off 2 sts, work across.

2nd row—Bind off 2 sts, work across. After 4 sts have been bound off on each side, decrease 1 st on each side until only 70 sts remain on needles.

Continue to k 1 row and p 1 row until work measures 12 inches or more in length from the first row. With No. 2 needles, k 2 sts, p 2 sts and repeat to make 1 inch of ribbing.

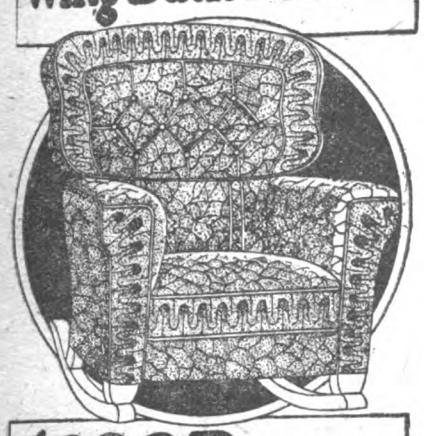
With plain wool on No. 5 needles, k 16 rows and bind off easily. These bands are rolled back over the ribbing which fit about the leg snugly.



Repeat work from 1st row once. Seam up legs from the bottom to point marked for decreasing. Then seam the two sides from the ribbing in the back to the center and up to the top of the ribbing in the front.

Slip-On Sweater

Cast 70 sts on No. 5 needles, k and p until work measures 8 to 9 inches, cast on 50 sts for sleeves, work across cast on 50 sts for second sleeve.



Work until sleeves measure 5½ inches. From wrist k 75 sts, bind off 20 sts for the neck.

Novel and Decorative Fly Chaser

By Felix J. Koch

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.,

YES, of course, flies are a nuisance,—they're unsanitary and so a menace to health,—and so on and on!

Particularly when one is serving sweets,—candies, cakes, soft drinks, other things of that sort,—out-of-doors do flies become a pest indeed!

Proprietors of permanent lunch-stands, candy-booths at street-intersections and places of that sort, usually make provision against the insects by mounting electric fans, or installing fine-mesh screening.

But parties opening booths and tables for some one brief occasion,—a church fair, a bazaar for some war-orphan charity, or what it may be,—can hardly adopt such measures as these. Simple, inexpensive improvisations must be resorted to, and the accompanying photograph goes to show one of the most picturesque and attractive of the sort we've met with anywhere.

Down Cincinnati way the patrons of a great Old People's Home hold an annual outdoor supper and bazaar for its benefit.

At this "fete" as it's always called, all manner of good things to eat and to drink are sold from booths and tables outdoors.

Naturally the flies are not behindhand in discovering the Al Fresco banquet, and naturally the flies would very soon descend in untold legions on everything exposed where they might light.

At a recent meeting of committeemen in charge of these food stands the matter came up for serious consideration.

The photograph serves to show the result.

Even the layman to vegetable-growing need not be told that the familiar asparagus-bed yields its succulent and toothsome shoots in the early springtime. Growers proceed to cut these as they will.

The bed finally exhausted of its crop of table asparagus, the plants in the tract are allowed to send up their improvised "Christmas-trees"; and these broad, delicate, airy and certainly far from unsightly bushings are permitted to flourish, die, and their stocks go to waste.

ASPARAGUS TIPS HUNG FROM TREE OVER FOOD STAND.

Time immemorial, country folk in particular have hung the bunches of feathery asparagus tops in this corner or that, or from the base of the hanging lamps of their sitting-room,—and this in order to attract, and so to divert, the flies from other points.

At this especial fairing, the good committee-folk improved on this basic idea:

Short sections of ordinary brown twine, camouflaging with the wood of the tree in point, were stretched, very much as so many ribs to a parasol might be, from the given tree trunk to whatever bough, or twig, might be necessary to make their angles uniform.

Upon these lines of cord then, bushes of asparagus were hung, each one close beside its neighbor, but not so close but that it might sway gently with every breeze that passed.

The tree-bowl converted to a great umbrella of asparagus in this way, other lines of cord were circled at appropriate intervals about the trunk. On these, more of the asparagus plants were hung.

A little touch here and a little touch there, for the sake of symmetry, and, lo, the big tree, about which there was placed the improvised table with the candy, or beneath which one had the booth of soft drinks or cakes, might have been some tall, bearded Southern cypress, except that the Southern moss was replaced here by the asparagus, than which, the experts tell us, there is absolutely no better panacea against the flies!

Comfort's League of Cousins

ing along at my side, her pretty face flushed and radiating careless happiness. My brothers all love her, too, but I don't think they understand her as I do. Did any of your mothers ever confide in you? It gives one a wonderful feeling that is impossible to describe. There is a rule in our League: "Be a comfort to one's parents." I think if all the girls would be more chummy and confidential with their mothers, and the boys more sociable with their fathers, these things would be the most comfort of all to them. And the parents would have less cause for worry over their children.

I am rather lonesome this evening (mother has a headache and is lying down), and I have been reading over your good chummy talks with each other. I could not resist writing. I wish more girls lived close around here, for it would be such fun to have parties and other entertainments.

I guess I will describe myself as other cousins do: I am five feet, four inches in height; have brown hair—not the beautiful curly kind, but the plain kind that must be waved on "curlers"—and I have brown eyes and not a fair complexion. I am rather dark, but, thank Providence, my skin is smooth! My features are regular, but certainly not dazzling. With all, I'm just a common western girl, not beautiful nor, thank you, ugly! I'll admit I have lots of admirers, but that's because I'm the only young female to admire within a radius of ten miles, perhaps.

Please, Uncle Lisha, do not let Billy, the nasty thing, get this, for I would like some of the cousins to write to me. Good by!

Your niece,

PAULINE BOYD

Pauline, your words about having a mother who is a good pal are well worth reading. You and your mother are to be congratulated in your happiness. That more parents are not comrades and companions to their children is the real cause of the separation—I mean a mental one of heart and brain—that thus occurs when their boy or girl reaches an age when they think about life for themselves and become individuals. Usually parents seek only to control their children and to make them think as they do. The sure result is that control cannot last forever, and that in trying to make the child think their thoughts, they finish by being left unable to know what the child is actually thinking. Feeling too much of disparity in outlook and experience, the child—a boy more than a girl, perhaps—shuts up the innermost of her being and the fatal separation has occurred—a separation that is impossible to bridge. Of course, parents have wisdom and the fruits of experience which entitle them to a belief that they can control for the best the thoughts and actions of their children, but the mistake in outlook is that experience cannot be thus passed on. This is unhappy, but true—as a look at the history of mankind shows us. Youth must have its own experience—and is eager for this. The sun is bright over young heads and life will not be lived vicariously at such times. The boy or girl, not obstinately, but instinctively, insists upon thinking his or her own thoughts—thoughts gathered from experience which, as it comes a generation later, is rather certain to be differently brain-rooted than that of parents, unless these parents have exceptional vision and a wisdom born of the truest and most unselfish of loves.

And so when things exist as I have written, uneasy relationships enter into the home. Parents say: "I can't see what is getting into "Tom"—"Mary". Of course what is getting into them is Life—and their parents have not held to a relationship that brings confidence. Again and again we see where a boy or girl will talk openly with an older outsider concerning things they would never think of mentioning to a father or mother. This should not be, but as things are it is inevitable.

You, Pauline, have a wise mother who has kept your confidence and love; and so you can bring to her, and not to any outsider, your hopes and your dream castles—being sure of her ears and heart in sympathy. A boy and girl should take it from this Uncle that it is one of the hardest and rarest things in the world for an older person to understand youth's viewpoint and to think sympathetically with youth's thoughts. For I yield to no one in my love of youth and my belief that I can think with them more than most. Yet in all humility I say here that I have erred again and again. I have hurt where I have meant to help. I have been unconsciously and serenely cruel where I aimed at kindness, and I have cried "selfishness" when I have been most selfish myself. My only advantage is that I can at least see where some of my faults have been, while I have known too many parents who have remained blind in self-satisfaction.

Pauline, your letter is a happy instance. I hope to hear from other girls who can write the same story, or get a letter from some boy who has been comraded by his father and found one of his best pals right at home.

POMEROY, 207 WETZGALL STREET, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Greetings from a new cousin. I hope the much-discussed (and probably cussed) Billy does not like my brand of ink and paper.

First, I will describe myself. Please take note of my originality. I notice that the other cousins usually leave the description until the last. I am fourteen years young and about five feet, ten inches short. I have black hair, a la pompadour, black eyes, one hundred and fifty pounds heavy—and I have one of the ugliest mugs in Meigs county. Maybe you think I am small for fourteen years, but we raise them that way here.

I read the letters of Ruth and Inez in a recent COMFORT and I thought that as long as it was a free-for-all discussion I might as well have my say and be done with it now, because I dearly love an argument and it is bound to be out sooner or later.

I live in a town of about four thousand people; and I'll bet we have some females here who think that Theda Bara is a piker compared to them. About the method that Inez would use, I don't think she would get started on some of the girls around here before she would be stifled by the wonderful (?) scent of the powder and perfume they use. I believe that powder is all right if it is used correctly I use it myself. Also some creams for the face are good, too, for faces that chap easily.

Maybe you think a fellow has to be thoroughly bad to play pool. Well, if anybody accuses me of being a cigarette smoking, low-down corner masher, he had better have his life insured; but I like to shoot pool. Also I like to dance. I don't give a hang for the modern combination hula-hula fox-trot, muscle wiggling dances, but you should see me waltz or do a Virginia Reel. I do not deny there are some boys that are a disgrace to the race. I know one who failed a year at school because he sat and looked at an empty-headed girl. They are both bad examples. Oh, by the way, I was going to slap the vanity cases and perfume bottles some girls carry. I used to work at one of the largest dry goods stores in town. The money came up to the cashier's desk in a money box system and when I'd open the little cars the perfume in some of the bills would nearly knock me over.

As to Ruth, I think she will have to be a hypocrite if she could ever make such a case-hardened powder-and-paint-slamming fellow as Jack so she was sweet, even in a dark corner and with a whole five minutes.

Personally I don't think that the young people of today are any worse than some of the older ages. I'll bet if you could get some old person from each generation back to Noah, they would all say that the younger generation of their day were worse than they were when they were children. How about it? Also I think that first of all we ourselves are as good as we can be. Do you remember that when the people brought a woman before Christ and accused her of a crime, He said, "Let the one among you who is without sin cast the first stone at her."

So much for the frivolous young people of today. But if any of you wish to argue with me (if I am good enough to pass Billy), I will discuss anything from whether the egg or the hen came first to the Einstein Theory. I might say also that I can't sell a bale of cotton for stamps as can Cousin Alvin Anderson—so please enclose a two cent if you write.

I might mention that my favorite sports are basket ball and reading. I am a sub on the high school team, but as I am only a Freshie there are lots ahead of me.

Well, I fear I must close. We have to commit Mark Antony's speech for a class tomorrow and I must cease.

Your loving cousin,

MARION LIETHLER.

P. S. If you can't pronounce my name try gargling it. And if anybody possesses the same I hope he or she will write to me.

Marion, you surely send in a large description and must be a good specimen of the wild if they raise 'em a la pompadour out in Ohio. No, I don't think any of our Family is going to believe a fellow thoroughly bad because he shoots pool, but he might be open to censure if he spends more time in playing pool than in making other more necessary shots in the Game of Life he is beginning. As you probably know, Marion, some boys make a billiard and pool room a sort of permanent headquarters, when they would be much better off to split up their time more and make their pool playing a recreation and not an occupation. You are a wise young pompadoured guy, Marion, old boy, and I know you'll agree with what I say—which is meant not for you so much as for other poolful and perhaps foolful nephews. A too small evil joined to too much pool playing, the time spent in bad air, tobacco smoke and under electric lights. I'm pretty certain that sunlight and the out-of-doors should keep the shooting of pool as occasional fun and not too much of a good thing.

41st row—2 sps, 1 blk, 3 sps, 4 blks, 4 sps, 1 lk, 1 sp 2 blks, * 47 sps, reverse from *, ch 5, rn.

42nd row—1 sp, 1 blk, 4 sps, 5 blks, 2 sps, 1 lk, 1 sp, 2 blks, * 49 sps, reverse from *, ch 5, rn.

43rd row—2 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, 5 blks, 1 sp, 1 lk, * 55 sps, reverse from *, ch 5, turn.

44th row—1 sp, 1 blk, 10 sps, 1 blk, * 7 sps, everse from *, ch 5, turn.

45th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, 5 blks, 1 sp, 2 lks, * 53 sps, reverse from *, ch 5, turn.

46th row—1 sp, 1 blk, 4 sps, 6 blks, 1 sp, 3 lks, * 51 sps, reverse from *, ch 5, turn.

47th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 3 sps, 5 blks, 2 sps, 3 lks, * 51 sps, reverse from *, ch 5, turn.

48th row—1 sp, 1 blk, 4 sps, 4 blks, 4 sps, 2 lks, * 51 sps, reverse from *, ch 5, turn.

49th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 10 sps, 1 blk, 18 sps, h 1, 1 d c on next d c in last row, ch 3, turn.

50th row—1 d c on double between 17th and 8th sps, 17 sps, 1 blk, 11 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, urn.

To shape the neck.

51st row—2 sps, 1 blk, 10 sps, 2 blks, 14 sps, ch 1, 1 d c on next d c, ch 3, turn.

52nd row—1 d c on d c between last 2 sps, 15 sps, 2 blks, 9 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

53rd row—2 sps, 1 blk, 7 sps, 4 blks, 12 sps, ch 1, 1 d c on next d c, ch 3, turn.

54th row—1 d c on d c between last 2 sps, 8 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 4 blks, 8 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

55th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, 6 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 6 sps, ch 1, 1 d c on next d c, ch 5, turn.

One is now beginning the 3rd rose on the side which is the same as the other 2, with the exception of being 1 sp nearer the border.

56th row—4 sps, 6 blks, 3 sps, 3 blks, 5 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

57th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 1 sp, 1 blk, 1 sp, 3 blks, 3 sps, ch 1, 1 d c, ch 5, turn.

58th row—4 sps, 3 blks, 1 sp, 5 blks, 1 sp, 1 blk, 5 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

59th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, 4 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 1 blk, 4 sps, 1 d c under ch 5, ch 5, turn.

Now continue to work on this width until this rose, the leaves and another rose are completed to a row the same as the 39th row, considering the difference of the pattern being 1 sp nearer the border. Next or 87th row, being worked from the outside edge; 2 sps, 1 blk, 9 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

88th row—5 sps, 3 blks, 2 sps, 1 blk, 8 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 1 blk, ch 5, turn.

89th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 6 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 1 blk, 9 sps, ch 5, turn.

90th row—2 sps, 3 blks, 4 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 2 blks, 6 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

91st row—2 sps, 1 blk, 3 sps, 4 blks, 2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, 4 blks, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

92nd row—3 sps, 4 blks, 1 sp, 1 blk, 3 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 3 blks, 3 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

93rd row—2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 2 blks, 4 sps, 1 blk, 7 sps, ch 5, turn.

94th row—3 sps, 4 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 3 sps, 3 blks, 3 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

95th row—2 sps, 1 blk, ch 1, 1 d c on next dc, 6 sps, 3 blks, 1 sp, 5 blks, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

96th row—2 sps, 4 blks, 2 sps, 3 blks, 6 sps, over sps, 1 sp over blk, thus shortening width by 1 sp, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

97th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 1 d c on next d c, 5 sps, 2 blks, 5 sps, 2 blks, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

98th row—8 sps, 1 blk, 7 sps over sp, 1 sp over blk, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

99th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 1 d c on next d c, 6 sps, 1 blk, 8 sps, ch 5, turn.

100th row—7 sps, 2 blks, 5 sps, 1 d c on first d c in blk in last row, 1 sp, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

101th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 1 d c on d c, 4 sps over sps, thus shortening 1 sp, 4 blks, 5 sps, ch 5, turn.

102nd row—4 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 1 blk, 5 sps, ch 2, 1 blk in sp beyond blk in last row, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

103rd row—2 sps, 1 blk, 1 d c on next d c, 4 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 1 blk, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

104th row—4 sps, 3 blks, 5 sps, ch 2, 1 blk, 1 sp as in row before the last, ch 5, turn.

105th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 1 d c on next d c, 11 sps. This is the first row of sps below the point of the front of the collar.

To Form the Point

Continue to decrease, as in the last few rows making 8 more rows of sps and the border. The 8th row being 2 sps, 1 blk, 1 d c on next d c, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

9th row—1 blk over 2nd sp in last row, 1 sp with a ch, 1 blk in sp, beyond blk in last row, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

Last row, 2 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 1 blk. Break thread.

Work the other side of the collar in exactly the same manner.

After completing this, finish the neck by working 3 s c in each sp.

Border of Collar

Beginning at the neck or inside edge of a point work 4 s c over blk, ch 5, turn, 1 sl st in first s c, *, ch 1, turn, 2 s c under ch 5, ch 3, sl st to form picot, 1 s c, 1 p, 1 s c, 1 p, 1 s c, 1 p, 2 s c. This completes 1 picot loop. 6 s c over next sp and block, ch 5, turn, sl st in first s c over blk. Repeat from *.

Continue around edge of collar, working 1 p loop over every other space.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

HORSE CAVE, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am one of the oldest sisters and past fifty and homely. Have taken COMFORT many years and think it is a wonderful paper.

How many sisters have visited their state capitol? I had that pleasure not long ago and surely enjoyed it. It is said to be one of the most beautiful buildings in the United States. At the south end of the grass lot in the center of State Street, stands a bronze statue of Senator William Goebel, mounted upon a pedestal of granite. It is the work of Charles Henry Niehaus of New York and cost the state $20,000.00.

The face work of the building is constructed of colitic limestone from Bedford, Indiana, with a Vermont granite base and rests upon a concrete foundation as solid as the everlasting hills. It is surrounded by an architectural stone terrace with concrete floors covered with vitrified brick. The outer walls of the building are ornamented with seventy Ionic columns, thirty-two on the front, four on either side and thirty on the back. All of them are monoliths, twenty-seven feet, ten inches tall and weigh about 18 tons each. In the center of the rotunda, under the dome, upon a massive pedestal of green serpentine marble, from Easton, Penn., rests a magnificent bronze statue of Abraham Lincoln. It is of heroic size, fourteen feet from base to top of statue and is the work of the accomplished sculptor, Mr. A. A. Weinman of New York, pupil of Augustus St. Gaudens who did the celebrated Lincoln statue which stands in Lincoln Park, Chicago. This was presented to the state by Mr. J. B. Speed of Louisville, Ky., at a cost of nearly $40,000.00 and is pronounced by experts to be more perfect than the Chicago statue.

The reception-room is one of the most beautiful in the building, the design being of the Louis XVI. period and resembles very much the Public Reception room of Queen Marie Antoniette in the Palace of the Grand Trainon at Versailles, France. It is handsomely furnished with hand-carved circassian walnut. The walls are decorated with hand-painted copies of the Gobelin tapestry. The floor is covered with a rug manufactured especially for the purpose, costing $1,800.00 and woven in Austria, the work requiring four months' time and it is so heavy, weighing 1027 pounds, that the loom was broken three times. It is said to be one of the largest specially designed rugs ever woven and the most perfect specimen of the Louis XVI. period extant in the United States.

The Chamber of the Court of Appeals is indeed handsome, perhaps more so than any other court room in the United States. The walls are panelled in solid Honduras mahogany, the ceiling is Dutch metal leaf, lacquered to represent old bronze, panelled with egg-and-dart mould effect and the furniture of mahogany is upholstered in olive green leather. The light fixtures are of brush brass, satin finish, and are exceedingly beautiful.

In the room of the Secretary of State, and much can be learned there of the early history of Kentucky, are the executive papers on file of every governor from Isaac Shelby to Governor Morrow; bound volumes of enrolled bills passed by the Legislatures from 1792 down to date. It is interesting to see the signatures of the earlier governors and note the splendid penmanship of the days of quill pens and hand-made paper.

It is rather a dangerous task to reach the lantern on top of the dome. The elevator is taken to the fourth floor and a flight of steps leads to the dome where you enter a shaft four feet, six inches in diameter and wind around a flight of spiral stairs, seventy-eight steps, and straight up a ladder of fifty rungs and then crawl through a small opening in the floor of the lantern.

The view is splendid but the height makes the average person dizzy.

Next time I will tell you of the grandeurs of the Mammoth Cave.

Good luck to all.

A LOVER OF COMFORT.

McCUNE, KANSAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have thought about writing but your corner has always been full, even though I weigh only 125 pounds. I am five feet, three inches tall, with brown hair, blue eyes, fair complexion and 24 years old. We have one child, a boy, four years old. His picture was taken the day he was one year old. His name is Lee Edgar. We are going to send him to school next fall. I think too many mothers make the mistake of waiting too long before starting their children in school. We live three-quarters of a mile from the schoolhouse. I am going to let him go in the morning and stay until noon, sending a lunch for recess. Then he can come home for his dinner and stay home the remainder of the day as he always takes a two-hours' nap in the afternoon. This is for the first year.

I am a farmer's wife and like farm life although I think the farmer has been getting the "hard end of the deal" the last few years. We have Farm Organizations in our county and think them a great help. If the farmers would all pull together they could do much better. We also have a Home Makers' Club and a club for the young married people, names "Social X". I think it makes the community more lively.

Love to all.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

The 13th annual convention of the Vegetable Growers' Association of America assembled in the Washington Armory at Albany, New York, November 1st to 5th. I am glad I had the pleasure of being among the number, it was time well spent.

I would like to paint the picture as flowery as it really was but my mind could not grasp and retain one-half of what I saw and heard so I will only touch on the margin as I hurry along.

Most beautiful of all, to my mind, was the mountain scenery of West Virginia through which I passed on the first day. It was the time of year when Nature had decked them in every imaginable color. The trees seemed to be out on dress parade with the clusters of evergreen here and there to add to the effect. As I looked upon this lovely mountainside my mind went back to childhood days for I have a warm, clinging affection for hills and woods and I could almost imagine I could hear the tinkle, tinkle of Old Brindle's bell in the distance.

Next came the Alleghany mountains which were somber and more elevated, stretching their proud heads toward the sky. The Blue Ridge Mountains have a bluish cast from which I suppose the name is derived.

"I have seen the mighty mountains,
With their fair heads in the skies,
I have seen their lofty summits,
Which in rugged beauty rise."

We darted in and pulled out of many tunnels but I could see no beauty in them. Some of them were from one-half to one mile long.

We passed through Virginia, Maryland, Penn. and N. J. at night and reached New York City the next morning at eight o'clock and transferred from one depot to another by subway. The depots are very large and difficult to get through. I was soon on my train, going up the Hudson River. Passenger boats had stopped running because of the lateness of the season. The night boat was still making trips from Albany to New York City: This trip, I am told, is a very pleasant one earlier in the season when the nights are warm and the moon is shining. I saw several large two-story concrete lighthouses in the middle of the river. They were built like farmhouses and were from one-half to one mile apart. I understand it is a very lonely life in the service of the Lighthouse Department of Uncle Sam, even for one season. Indeed it seems mournful as the winds sigh and howl around the house.

I reached Albany at noon and went to the Armory where discussions were made on greenhouse work and truck growing. You may think these conventions would not interest the women but they

May, the Planting Month

MAY, with her softly smiling skies, her showers, her flower-bedecked bowers—not half her glories have ever been woven into songs or poetry. May is the month of promise, the month of awakening, the month of planting. But, pleasant as the weather may be, and joyous the opportunity of those so fortunate as to have garden work (rightfully it should be called play at this season) to do, May marches rapidly; seeds planted today seem to sprout over night and magically appear on the morrow; weeds greet the eye where yesterday the ground was newly hoed; everything is fairly bursting with pent-up energy and life. May, for the gardener, is the hurry-up month—the month when his annual battle starts with insects and weeds. Much is to be done in crowded time that is all too short for its accomplishment.

Early Garden Pests

Is there a farmer or gardener living who has not at some time or other grumbled to himself or declared to the world at large: "Just as soon as a bud opens on a tree or a green shoot pokes its nose above ground, there is a bug of some kind waiting to make a meal off it!" Perhaps more is said on this subject, but for good and sufficient reasons we are leaving it unwritten.

Space does not permit us to enumerate all of the troublesome insects that make their first appearance in May, nor would that tedious chore be fruitful. It is sufficient to say that if "the pesky critters" are severely and promptly dealt with when they first make their appearance a lot of future trouble will be avoided. Remember that most of these early season bugs are the mature or adult insects that have managed to survive the rigors of winter in hibernation; now coming forth to lay eggs for the new "crop". By destroying either the insects or their eggs—or both is better—we may escape the ravage of the next generation that will appear in myriads about midsummer.

One of the most troublesome of all garden pests is the cutworm, that naked, dirty grayish or greenish-brown caterpillar that seems to have as its life's work the destruction of tomato and cabbage plants as soon as they are transplanted to the garden, and of corn or anything else that is green, for that matter, as soon as the plants show above ground. The cutworm has been called "the weasel of the insect world", and well it may be so designated. Like the weasel, the cutworm seems to glory in killing more than it needs; one weasel will kill an entire pen of chickens or a newly hatched clutch of young partridge or quail in a single night, not to eat, but to kill and leave, perhaps sucking only a small portion of the blood. When we are greeted in the morning by several rows of new cabbage plants girdled and cut off at the ground, without any of the leaves eaten, we wonder if the cutworm isn't really a worm-weasel after all, a despicable juice-sucking night prowler, for this pest works at night only, burrowing underground in the daytime. For this reason he is seldom if ever caught at work; all we find is the strong evidence. All we can do is replant in his tracks, then poison with bran into which Paris green has been mixed dry at the rate of 1 pound of the latter to 50 pounds of bran. Add molasses sweetened water to make a dry mash that is just sticky enough to stay in lumps. Place spoonfuls on the ground every two yards or less in the rows of cabbage, sweet corn, new strawberry plants or wherever the pests have caused damage. Scatter more around the edges of the garden in the grass and weeds. Then keep the chickens away, for Paris green will poison them just as readily as it will kill the cutworms.

Controlling Onion Maggots

Another bad pest that can be controlled if taken in time is the onion maggot, but if steps are not taken until the maggots appear on the bulbs it is then too late to control them. The maggots hatch from eggs layed by the onion maggot fly in May in the north, or just after the young onion plants come through the ground. If egg-laying is not prevented, maggots will appear later on in the season to eat the bulbs and to induce decay. Sprinkling tobacco dust over the ground around the young onions two or three times at intervals of a week while the onions are still small will help keep the flies away. Another remedy that is widely and successfully used is poisoning with bait made of sodium arsenate and molasses. First dissolve one-fifth ounce of sodium arsenate in a little boiling water. Add one pint of cheap molasses. Mix thoroughly, adding the remainder of a gallon of water. Scatter the liquid bait with an old whisk-broom over the young onion plants and the ground adjoining the rows. The molasses attracts the flies, then the poison gets in its good work. It may be well to keep this poison recipe in mind, for it will be found useful in fighting any fly or moth that is known to "have a sweet tooth".

Remember to reserve some space in the garden for sweet corn and popcorn. Plant sweet corn at one side of the garden and popcorn as a border at the other side in a place where it will not be in the way if left to mature and dry out on the stalks. Plant one row of some good yellow variety of sweet corn and another row of some white variety that will mature later in the season. Golden Bantam is a yellow favorite; Evergreen is widely grown as a late white. Then consider the kiddies likes, remember the pleasant evenings with a popcorn popper when you yourself were young, and plant a row or two of popcorn. It is hardy, grows well in moist soils, and yields bountifully. Plan now for pleasant winter evenings around the fireplace or kitchen stove "poppin' corn and eatin' it".

Bordeaux Mixture Formula

Notwithstanding the fact that full instructions for making and using Bordeaux have been published in the past in these columns, each spring brings the urgent request "How is Bordeaux mixture made?" from our ever increasing family of readers. For that reason we anticipate the need of instructions on this important subject, and giving full instructions before we are asked to do so.

There are a number of formulae for preparing Bordeaux mixture, each of which has its own desirable qualities, but the following has met every test and is giving satisfaction under different conditions in various parts of the country.

Blue vitriol (Copper sulphate)	8 pounds
Lime	8 pounds
Water, to make	100 gallons

At times it may be found desirable to use only 6 pounds each of copper sulphate and lime, but we will explain this later. Dissolve the copper sulphate in a wooden barrel and dilute to make 50 gallons. Slake the lime, being careful to avoid "drowning" or "burning." When thoroughly slaked, dilute to make 50 gallons, using a wooden barrel as for the blue vitriol (blue stone). Dip from the two barrels alternately, and pour through a gunny sack or other strainer into the spare tank or barrel. When a large number of trees are to be sprayed, it will be found best to prepare large quantities of the material at one time. This may be done with safety, provided they are not mixed until the spraying is to be done, for let it be remembered that Bordeaux mixture loses some if its "strength" when allowed to stand mixed for long. These stock solutions may be prepared as follows:

Suspend 40 pounds of copper sulphate in a burlap sack in 40 gallons of water. Hang it well up from the bottom of the barrel. In about five hours the crystals will be dissolved. One gallon of this stock solution equals one pound of the copper sulphate crystals. Do not allow this solution to stand in tin or iron receptacles. Keep the barrel tightly covered to avoid losses by evaporation; mark the height of the liquid in the barrel, if it is to be allowed to stand for long, so that it shrinks by evaporation, then bring it up to this point again when used by adding more water.

To make a stock solution of lime, proceed as follows: Slake 40 pounds of lime. Add about two pailfuls of water at first, and then allow lime to heat well before stirring. When hot add more water slowly as it is absorbed, and stir thoroughly. The hot lime improves by standing about one hour if stirred frequently. Add water to make 40 gallons. One gallon of stock then equals one pound of unslaked lime.

These stock solutions can be kept separately for considerable periods and mixed together as desired. To prepare 100 gallons of Bordeaux, stir the stock solution thoroughly, measure 8 gallons of the copper sulphate solution into a 50 gallon barrel and fill with water. Measure 8 gallons of lime stock solution into another barrel and fill this with water also. Stir both thoroughly. Strain equal amounts of each solution at the same time through a gunny sack or strainer into a third barrel, two men pouring, or run the mixture through a trough or spout into the spray tank. Occasionally it is best to use a somewhat weaker solution for spraying very tender foliage; in this case measure out only 6 pounds or gallons of the lime and blue stone instead of 8 pounds or gallons.

Bordeaux should be tested before using. This may be done by adding a drop of solution prepared by dissolving a few crystals of potassium ferro-cyanide in a small amount of water to a small quantity of the Bordeaux. If a brown discoloration occurs when the drop of ferro-cyanide mixes with the Bordeaux, more lime should be added to equalize the excess of copper sulphate.

Potassium ferro-cyanide is very poisonous. Have a poison label on the bottle and be careful.

Preventing Wildfire of Tobacco

On farms where the comparatively new "wildfire" disease of tobacco has occurred, the grower should take precautions to reduce the danger of introducing the disease into the plant beds by following the six precautions or control measures listed below:

1. Locate beds a considerable distance from where tobacco beds or fields were located last year, and away from tobacco sheds.
2. Do not use refuse from tobacco sheds or stripping room for fertilizer in seed beds or field, but preferably rake up all such refuse and destroy it before the beds are started.
3. Use new frame boards or disinfect old boards by sprinkling or painting with some good disinfecting solution such as 1 part of formalin to 25 parts of water.
4. Use new seed bed covers, or sterilize the old ones by boiling for one hour.
5. Use seed known to come from uninfested districts or seed that has been disinfected. Seed may be treated most safely by using corrosive sublimate (1 part to 1,000 parts of water) into which the seed contained in a cheesecloth bag is dropped for 10 to 15 minutes. Rinse thoroughly with pure water and dry as rapidly as possible. Corrosive sublimate is a strong poison but will not affect the hands. It does corrode metal, and for that reason a glass or wooden vessel should be used for holding the solution.
6. As a final measure the grower may have to resort to spraying or dusting the beds with Bordeaux mixture if the disease becomes sufficiently serious in spite of all other precautions. Spraying or dusting should be done once a week from the time the leaves are as large as a dime until the pulling of the plants is completed. Such treatment may be found to be efficient in preventing heavy spread infection throughout the bed.

Poisoning Gophers

While the land is being prepared for the best time to poison the striped and gray gophers. If steps are taken at this the mature gophers will be killed young gophers will never grow to maturity damage farmer's crops.

Dissolve one-eighth ounce of strychnine gallon of hot water and allow to cool as much corn as the solution will cover. for 18 to 24 hours. In this time the corn have absorbed all of the liquid, or at enough to make it highly effective. If the solution remains, add more corn and to soak.

Place the poisoned corn in gopher found in the field, around its borders and hard-packed dirt of roads and driveways gophers like to burrow. In pasture bait far enough down the holes to be the reach of farm animals. Do not poisoned corn broadcast at any time. the hens do not range far enough afield and eat it, turkeys no doubt will. Place in the burrows and be on the safe side.

Sweet Cream Butter

Creamerymen are slowly coming to that the best butter to make is the sweet butter, as it is the commodity for which consumer is willing to pay the best Sweet cream butter has been kept in storage for a year and at the end of that tested higher than the average fresh made from unpasteurized cream or from teurized ripened cream. Moreover, it scores highest on the market.

The market for sweet cream butter is created. At prevailing market prices cream nets the farmer about 20 to 25 cents a hundred pounds of milk than would average quality. The big thing in the facture of sweet cream butter is cooperation the farmer with the creamery man is that clean, sweet cream is brought to the

New Zealand manufactures sweet cream ter only. So do parts of Canada. Legis tion makes this compulsory in these The consumer likes the product better and more of it, paying willingly a fancy price what he likes. Therefore the farmer can afford to give thought to the likes and dislikes of the purchaser—even if more care must be exercised to keep cream sweet and thereby earn the fancy prices. This high-grade, well-keeping, palatable butter will eventually dominate our markets, we are told by our dairy experts. Already consumers are demanding more and more of it. Every dairyman should for these reasons, acquaint himself with sweet cream butter, the steps necessary for its production, and the benefits that will accrue to himself, for the time is fast approaching when he will be required to play his part in its production.

A Simple Limestone Analysis

Grinding limestone found on or near the home farm, then spreading it upon the land, is a practice that is fast becoming more popular as a cheap means of increasing productivity by correcting soil acidity. Until recently, however, farmers have been compelled either to send their limestone samples to their state agricultural college chemists for analysis or to use the limestone without analysis and "take a chance" that its lime content is high enough to make it really useful. This is no longer necessary. Due to a simple analysis that any farmer can perform, tests may be made right on the farm without going to any expense for equipment. Prof. C. G. Hopkins of the Illinois Agricultural College, has made this possible, and here is how it is done:

Take two ordinary bottles that will hold about as much as water glasses. Wash them thoroughly, then allow them to dry inside and out. Fill one nearly full of dilute hydrochloric acid made by mixing strong hydrochloric acid with an equal volume of water. If it foams profusely, add a few drops of lubricating oil. In the second bottle place 22½ grams of the crushed limestone to be tested. Weigh both bottles together and write down the combined weight. (If no scale is at hand, have the weighing done for you at some store in town where an apothecary's scale is available.) Set the bottle containing the limestone in water to keep it cool when the acid is added. Gradually pour part of the acid upon the limestone, stirring it gently in the meantime, then add more acid little by little until no more foaming takes place when acid is added. Stop when this point is reached. Blow the gas out of the bottles, wipe dry, and then weigh the bottles again together.

For every gram loss in weight the relative purity is 10 per cent. To illustrate: If the two bottles together weigh 937 grams before the reaction, and 927 grams after foaming ceases, the loss in weight is 10 grams. Since each gram lost indicates 10 per cent. of purity, and we have found a total loss of 10 grams, the sample tested has a purity of 10 times 10, or 100 per cent. If the loss in weight is only 3 grams, then the relative purity is 3 times 10, or 30 per cent. If the loss in weight is 4½ grams, the relative purity is 45 per cent., etc.

The loss in weight when the acid is added is due to the escape of carbon dioxide gas. The same gas is driven out of the limestone in the lime kiln when the stone is burned, only the lighter quick lime remaining.

Seedless Snow Apples

An apple without either seed or core sounds impossible; still, such an apple has been accidentally produced by a Quebec, Canada, apple grower. A basket of perfect fruit from the "freak" tree was recently exhibited at the winter show of the Quebec Fruit Growing Society, where it attracted wide attention.

The apples are of the Fameuse variety with the typical coloring and shape characteristic of the family except that at either end they have just a slight mark instead of the usual depression that indicates the core. The "blossom end" is therefore more smooth and round than in core-bearing apples. The coreless and seedless apples come from an orchard of 100 Fameuse trees that have just come into bearing for the first time. Unfortunately the fruit apples were not noticed by the pickers but were discovered because of their odd shape by the packers only when all the fruit had been removed from the trees. Therefore it was impossible to trace them to the one or more trees from which they originated, and this point will not be settled until next fall when they again bear fruit.

Baby Turks—Guineas and Squabs

THERE are so many things I want to call attention to this month that really I hardly know where to begin, but as several readers have written me asking me to give them information about ising young turkeys and guineas, I suppose e shall have to let them have the right of way, ough squabs and goslings ought to have some tention.

To begin with turkeys. I generally steal ie first ten eggs from each nest and set them ider hens However many a turkey lays ter that, she is allowed to keep and hatch iem. It takes them twenty-nine days to itch, and large, motherly old hens should be iosen from the chicken-house to do the inibating. It is not safe to put more than 'e such eggs under an ordinary hen.

When the hatch is over, put the hen into brood coop, and in front of it put a box out nine inches deep and large enough to rm a yard for the babies to exercise in. It is, course, necessary to remove part or the whole the end of the box which joins the front of ie coop, so that the little ones can run in and it. Cover the bottom of the box with coarse nd and put a small drinking fountain in one orner. Thus the babies will have a safe ace to play the first few days of infancy, hen they must be kept dry. After that the ox can be removed and the coop moved a w feet every day for the sake of cleanliness.

When Mrs. Turkey's brood hatches, we eat them in the same way, only the brood oop is specially made and is much larger than ie ordinary hencoop. The first feed the abies have is stale home-made bread soaked scalded milk, which is squeezed out of it efore it is fed. Like little chicks, they must ave nothing for twenty-four hours; then little nd often must be the rule.

Never leave food in front of little turkeys, for they are very apt to overeat. After two weeks they need only be fed four times a day: after the fourth week three times a day. After the first two days add a little hard boiled egg which has been chopped fine without removing the shell, and a few days later pinhead oatmeal and ground charcoal; about a teaspoonful of the latter to a cupful of bread and oatmeal.

By the end of two weeks gradually reduce the bread and increase the oatmeal, which should be cooked half an hour and allowed to dry out, so it is easily crumbled when cool.

After the fourth week, ordinary ground oats, just moistened with scalding milk, may be used. Half boiled liver, chopped fine, is the best animal food to give. When that is not practicable, use the best brand of commercial ground beef; no more than one teaspoonful to a quart of meal, because it is very strong, and liable to produce diarrhea, a disease which attacks young turkeys almost sooner than any other young bird. Watch carefully, and at the first sign of any looseness of the bowels give boiled rice to eat and rice water or cold tea to drink.

Watch newly hatched babies for a few days at feed time, for there is often one or more that needs to be taught how to eat. This is especially so when they are with common hens. But a little patience in crumbling close in front of them and coaxing them to pick it up will overcome the difficulty. After they are eight weeks old we take them from the hens and put them into the third yard, which is kept exclusively for young stock.

At night they are driven into the shed, the front of which is always kept covered with wire netting, so that they can be closed in until they get accustomed to roosting. Of course, the perches in this shed are put nearer the ground and are much smaller than those intended for grown birds. About October 1st they are allowed the free range of the farm and are fed on corn at night and given all the milk they will drink, to get them into good killing condition before Thanksgiving, when they are all sold off, except perhaps a few extra good ones, which we may keep for stock. The old birds are also allowed free range from October until February, but they are fed in the yards at night and are shut in so that they don't form any bad, wandering habits.

I utilized a poor strip of brush land which had good natural drainage, and made three inclosures, each one hundred feet wide and three hundred feet long. An open shed twelve feet long and ten feet wide was built on each. They were just rough shelters built out of slabs, and the only fittings were perches made out of sassafras poles, none of them less than nine inches in circumference. This is one of the important items in fixing a place for turkeys. Being heavy, large-footed birds, they are uncomfortable and positively suffer if confined themselves on slight perches such as are used for chicken-houses.

If you are only going to keep a few birds, say a trial of five hens and a gobbler—large yards are not necessary, but a shed over which netting can be put should always be set apart for their use, so that they can be fed and shut up at night. Never, under any circumstances, keep any of the pullets you raise, unless you change your gobbler. Don't let two gobblers run with the flock at the same time. If you want to increase your number of birds you must keep the toms in separate yards, and turn in two or three hens at a time, leaving them there for two or three days. One service is all that is necessary for each clutch of eggs, or use large inclosures as we do.

Guinea fowl are very profitable stock on a farm, or where they can have plenty of range, for guinea fowl will find the larger part of their feed. Even when the eggs are hatched under hens, the hen can be released at the end of four weeks, and the youngsters will come up at night with full crops, and until marketed in the fall, they need have nothing but a little cracked corn at night, just to bring then home regularly and keep them tame.

Guinea fowls commence laying when the first warm days come in April. As it is their natural instinct to be very secretive about laying, some patience and diplomacy are necessary to locate their nests. The usual spot selected is a hollow in the ground, by the root of a tree, or fence post well screened by brush. Don't attempt to approach it while they are in sight. Go away, and return later armed with a long-handled spoon. The eggs are almost the color of the earth, and often covered with fallen leaves, so it needs a sharp eye to detect them. Be very careful not to touch the nest with your hand. Guineas seem able to scent the human hand about the nest; they can also count up to three. For that reason leave that number of eggs in the nest, removing the others with the spoon to insure there being no telltale clew left to arouse Mrs. Guinea's suspicions.

When you have fifteen stolen eggs, get a box a foot square, turn it on its side, and across the bottom of the open front nail a slat, behind which place a nest of soft hay. Stand this nest box inside (at one end) of another box, two and one-half feet long, with sides a foot or more deep. Make a cover of wire netting for the large box, to open like a lid. Scatter sand on the floor, nail up a small drinking pan in one corner, and you have a safe, rain-proof coop for Biddy and the eggs. Another motive for the outer box is that baby guineas are so very little, so wild, and so easily frightened, that they are apt to quit the nest as soon as hatched, get lost, become chilled, and die.

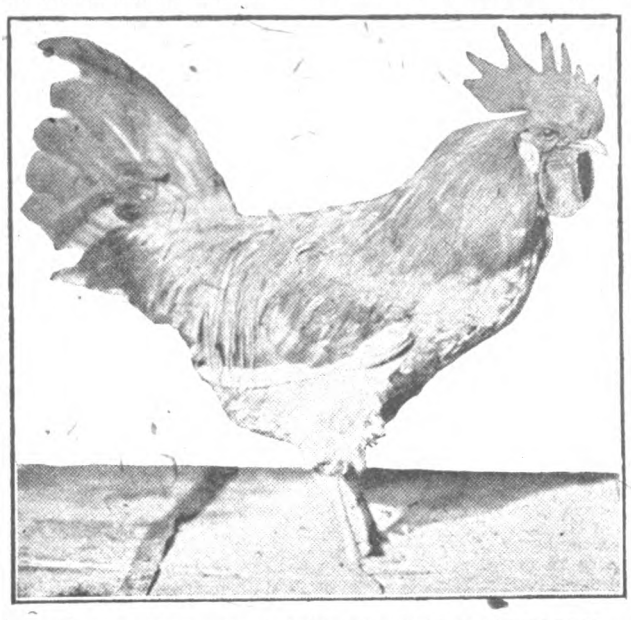
It takes from twenty-five to twenty-six days to incubate guinea eggs. The brood coop to be used the first two weeks should be on the same principle as the nest boxes, and even when they are on the grass run, you must exercise the greatest caution to avoid anything like cracks and crevices in or around the sides, for they are such mites, and have such capacity for crawling through the eyes of needles, that special care is necessary. If some knothole or some depression in the ground has escaped your notice and a baby does stray off, go about two yards away and remain perfectly still. Don't be impatient. It may be ten minutes before you hear anything. Then, unless all hope is over, you will hear a plaintive little cry. Do not move until it has been repeated two or three times, and you are quite sure where it comes from. Then make a sudden dive and secure the truant, which is usually under some tuft of grass or in some little hole. If you move about while hunting for him, there won't be a sound, and you may search all day with little success.

Bill of Fare for Baby Guineas

Give nothing for the first twenty-four hours, then the daily bill of fare should be as follows: First feed, 7 A. M.—Crushed hempseed, half a cup; stale bread-crumbs, half a cup; moisten with raw eggs.

Second feed, 9 A. M. —Millet seed.

Third feed, 11.30 A. M.—Chopped onion tops, half a cup of cornmeal that has been steamed as for chicks, half a teaspoonful of crushed mustard seed, mixed and fed crumblingly.



Fourth feed, 2 P. M.—Pinhead oats, crushed a little finer than when it is bought.

Fifth feed, 5 P. M.—Liver that has been half boiled, cracked wheat and corn, equal parts.

These bills of fare can be varied with pot cheese custard, chopped lettuce or apple, bread-crumbs moistened with milk, hard boiled eggs; but every day they must have meat (more than chicks need), and pepper or mustard seed crushed and fed in soft wood. Keep a small pan of powdered charcoal and sand in the run, and, of course, water in a drinking fountain that will only allow the beak to get wet.

Pigeons

The parent birds take all the trouble and responsibility of feeding the young and raising them right up to the time they are ready for market. The hen bird lays two eggs, with one day intervening, which take eighteen days to incubate. After the eggs are hatched, both birds devote their entire energies to feeding the youngsters for about two weeks, for both have the power to secrete the predigested substance often called pigeon's milk, on which nestlings are exclusively fed for the first few days. At the end of two weeks the hen has usually laid more eggs in the second nest, so that by the time the squabs in the first nest are ready for market, the second eggs are ready to hatch. It is this double family which necessitates two nests for each pair of birds.

A PERFECT TYPE. NOTE COMB AND SPACE BETWEEN LEGS.

If you start with a few pairs of birds, the best way to increase the number is to sell the squabs, and use the money to buy mature birds, for it takes pigeons six months to reach maturity, and it is necessary to have two houses in which to keep the growing birds, as they should not be allowed to remain in the regular brood pen. If, however, you have specially mated birds, and desire to raise their progeny, you must watch the nests, and as soon as the young ones get out on the floor (the old ones generally push them out when the eggs in the second nest hatch), they can fend for themselves, and should be removed to a nursery house, where all feed should be cracked to the size of rice for several weeks. When one desires to build up size and good points, it is necessary to have two nursery houses, and so be in a position to select the best birds from different parentages to mate.

To illustrate: The nestlings from one side of the house should go into nursery number one, nestlings from the other side into nursery number two. Our nurseries are only seven by ten feet, so we never have more than twenty birds in each, and they can be taken within a few days of each other, in this way making very little difference in age when it comes to mating time. When the younger ones in the nurseries are between six and seven months old, we take a bird from each and put them into a mating cage, which is really a coop, four feet long, two and one-half feet deep and two feet high, which is fastened up in a corner of the feed house. The coop is divided into two compartments. If they are male and female, they will commence within a week or two to coo and talk to each other through the wire, at which time the compartment is fastened up to the top of the cage, and they are allowed to have the run of the coop for three or four days, after which they are put into a regular breeding house where they will soon take possession of the nest. If, however, the birds chosen simply ignore each other after they are put into the mating cage, one of them is removed to another cage, and two more birds are taken from the nursery house and put into the two compartments. In this way we go through the nests until we have them all paired.

T. V.—The coal oil probably killed the mites which caused scaly leg, but to remove the rough appearance you must soak the bird's feet and shanks in warm soapy water for about ten or fifteen minutes, then scrape with a soft brush and plenty of white soap. Dry with a soft rag, and then anoint with carbolic vaseline or coal oil. As a means of prevention you had better clean the perches, and disinfect them, as these mites are very apt to take possession of the cracks and crevices to breed in, and so spread the trouble to the rest of the flock.

BOYS! Have Fun And Make Money With This Complete PRINTING OUTFIT

For A Club Of Only Two!

TOMMY Jones in the above picture is all smiles because he has printed some name cards for a neighbor for which he is to receive 50 cents. You can do the same. With this practical Printing Outfit you can print cards, tags, envelopes, small circulars, letter heads, bill heads, etc., and do the work well. There is always a demand for this kind of printing and if you are a "live wire" you can doubtless get a lot of jobs to do for your friends and neighbors and thereby earn considerable pocket money. And you will be learning something, too—typesetting, composition, correct use of capitals, punctuation, abbreviations, business terms and phrases—to say nothing of the fun you get out of it.

Everything in this Outfit is of the best quality. It contains one complete font of rubber type, or in other words, from eight to fourteen of each of the letters in the alphabet—both capitals and small letters; all the numerals from 1 to 10—two to three of each numeral—dollar signs, a full assortment of commas, periods, colons, semi-colons, hyphens, quotation, percentage and parenthesis marks, exclamation and question points, slugs, pointing hands and words and pharases most commonly used in business, such as "For Sale By," "Return To," "No.", "Co.," etc. Then there is a four-line type holder, a pair of metal pinchers (to pick up the type with), and an everlasting ink pad in a metal case.

Parents should encourage their children in the use of this practical Printing Outfit, because it will furnish them with no end of fun, valuable instruction, and a chance to earn money of their own. Girls like this Outfit as well as the boys, and father and mother will also find it useful in the home in a hundred different ways.

Circuits Best Adapted to Broadcast Receiver

MUCH has been said regarding the different circuits best for broadcast receivers; at the present time there are hundreds of circuits in use, and nearly all of them are good. However, there are some that are much better than others, and the newcomer in Radio is often puzzled to know which to use in building his set.

The three-circuit tuner and the single circuit regenerative circuit seem to be the prevailing ones at the present time, and we will confine this article to a discussion of the relative merits of these two circuits.

Simplicity of operation, good loud signals and economy seem to be the chief factors to take into consideration when making plans for a radio receiver. Selectivity is also a big advantage and must not be overlooked. Which is the more important it is hard to say, but if we recognize the fact that almost all the larger radio manufacturing concerns who employ the finest engineers to develop their Radio sets in accordance with the public demand are using the circuit which allows simplicity, loud signals and economy, we must consider that the single circuit is best for radio broadcast reception.

A three-circuit tuner will no doubt give greater selectivity than the single circuit and allow the owner to tune out stations that interfere with other stations working on a wave very nearly the same, but it is impossible to separate two stations working on the same wave length either with a three-circuit tuner or any other. The only solution to that problem is for the government to allot different wave lengths to the numerous stations instead of allowing a hundred or more to send on the same wave length. The operation of the three-circuit tuner is more complicated than the single circuit and unless the owner is more or less familiar with the principles of Radio he will probably experience some difficulty in tuning in the various stations and clearing up the voice or music.

Much has also been said relative to the sending out of a wave by certain sets using regenerative principles, and it is true that if the detector tube of a regenerative receiver is allowed to burn too brightly or the tickler coil is advanced too far the tube will oscillate, causing a wave to be sent out from the aerial which other receiving sets within a short distance will hear; and it is very disagreeable to listen to. This wave is sent out from any regenerative set whether it is a single circuit or a three circuit, and it is up to every Radio fan to be careful not to let his tube oscillate.

Aside from the above mentioned facts the economy of making a single circuit tuner also appeals to the average person. It is much cheaper to build a single circuit set than a three circuit. The variometers of the three-circuit set cannot be made easily by an inexperienced workman, and to buy them is quite a little expense.

Selectivity may be obtained on the single circuit tuner if care is taken in selecting the proper aerial. For fine tuning the aerial should not be too high. A low aerial is also better for short range reception, and when the broadcasting station is only a few miles off it is well to use a separate aerial not more than forty feet long to get the best results. For long distance reception however, a longer aerial is necessary. Seventy to one hundred feet is the average length of a long distance aerial. These facts are very important and many sets are blamed for being broad when in reality the aerial is at fault.

In figure 1 the single circuit tuner is shown, and figure 2 gives the three-circuit arrangement. It is not difficult for even the newcomer in Radio to see that the three-circuit tuner is far more complicated and consequently more selective than the single circuit, and it is also obvious that the single circuit is simpler and naturally more economical. The greater volume in the single circuit is accounted for by the fact that the energy from the aerial goes direct to the detector tube.

There are many arrangements for the single circuit but regardless of the arrangement, the radio fan contemplating building his own set will be far more successful if he uses one arrangement of the single circuit.

Questions and Answers

Q.—In your November issue you state that bevelled head screws 2 inches long must be used. I have been unable to find screws of this length. Is it possible to use shorter ones? (b) I also do not know how to fasten the ends of the wire when wrapping the coils so they will not loosen till I have wound wire on. (c) Do the holes in the tubes go through both sides of the tube, and why are the holes to be smaller on one side than the other? O. W. M., Dalton, Ohio.

A.—(a) Shorter screws cannot be used at this point. (b) When taking off taps one of the easiest ways to keep the wire tight is to twist the wire into a loop about 6 inches long at the point desired; then continue winding and take off all other taps in a similar manner. The loops are later snipped separately and the wire soldered together close to the coil. This leaves the tap in the form of a single wire about 12 inches long running from the face of the coil, and is to be soldered to the proper switch point when assembling the set. (c) The holes in the tube on the side facing the panel are made larger in order to accommodate the large coil-support screws, while the ones on the opposite side serve merely to carry the bearing screws and need not be of such heavy gauge.

Q—I am building one of your regenerative sets and cannot find a coil with eight taps, and would like to know what kind of a coil and tickler is best to use if there are so many kinds and most coils have 10 or 14 taps. M. O., Tracy, Minn.

A.—In case you do not care to build your own coil any standard variocoupler may be used regardless of number of taps. However, there is a coil on the market known as the PRL tuner, and you can obtain one by writing direct to the Portland Radio Laboratory, 52½ Temple St., Portland, Me.

Q.—After reading your Radio Flashes I have decided to make the set. In winding the antenna coil will a coat of paraffin do in place of shellac? (b) In the wiring diagram you have an instrument labelled Grid Cond. Grid Leak. You also stated capacity of same as .0005 M. F. Will a grid cond. of .002 M. F. take the place of the one mentioned, with same results? What has the grid leak to do with it? Is it contained in all grid condensers? (c) Where does the ground wire connect to the Antenna Coil? (d) In the wiring diagram there is an instrument labelled "Tickler bulb". Is this the tickler coil contained in the antenna coil? What position should this coil be in when placing the dial on shaft? L. H., Wingate, Ind.

A.—(a) Paraffin could be used as you suggest, but the shellac will make a much neater job of it. (b) No, the condenser mentioned is of much too large a capacity and would be useful only as a phone condenser. The proper value will vary somewhat with the tube used but in all probability no larger value than .0005 M. F. should be used with this set. The grid-leak is very essential; and when ordering grid condenser from a dealer be sure to specify that leak be included. Otherwise a plain grid condenser without leak will probably be sent you. (c) Ground wire connects to the switch arm and negative filament lead. This is a misprint and should read Tickler Ball. Yes this is the Tickler coil mentioned as being inside the antenna coil. The tickler should be at right angles to the antenna coil at the zero position of dial.

Q.—Please send me plans to make a simple receiving set that I could hear about 160 miles. C. B., Fort Cobb, Okla.

A.—We suggest that you build the set described in the December and February numbers of COMFORT.

NOTE.—Many questions similar to the above have been sent in and we must refer each of them to the above answer to conserve space. We do not supply plans separate from the magazine. Plans may be obtained from any radio dealer, however.

Please, Thank You, and Excuse Me

By A. L. Crabb

A GENTLEMAN came out of the office of the manager of a mercantile establishment. He had been a welcome visitor for he had placed an order for thirty-five hundred dollars' worth of goods. In the waiting-room, he took his overcoat from the rack and put it on. The office boy, who sat reading, made no move to help him. As the customer was leaving, the boy, springing up suddenly to answer a call, bumped unceremoniously into him. Growling and glaring back over his shoulder, the boy disappeared in the direction of the summoning gong.

The man opened the door and went out. On the street, he paused, wavered irresolutely, and then went back into the manager's office.

"I like your goods," he said to the manager, after he had related the occurrence in the waiting-room, "but I also like the common decencies of life. Perhaps I am foolishly prejudiced, but I believe that rudeness on the part of any employee of an institution like yours manifests a general weakness; and on the strength of that belief I am cancelling the order I gave you. Good-morning."

The manager's first impulse was to fire the office boy and kick him out of the building, but he didn't do it. Instead, he seriously considered the matter for several minutes. Then, he summoned the boy.

"Bob," he said, "you have caused this company to lose a large and profitable order."

"How's that?"

The manager explained.

"What'd he expect me to do," demanded Bob, derisively, "kiss his hand?"

"Bob," said his superior, gravely, "there is just one reason why I didn't chase you out of here right off the reel, and that is I deserve to be fired myself. I really deserve to for having demanded plain, every-day courtesy every one connected with this firm. I've been too busy with other things. But this gentleman was right. From time on, courtesy is the general order, and will take me considerably less than two weeks to fire the first violator. Now, remember, Bob."

It is of record that Robert's memory has been excellent.

Undoubtedly, politeness pays in business, but it also pays elsewhere, and pays well. If it pays in dollars and cents or not. In some of things most desirable it is one of the great of dividend producers.

Judged from many viewpoints, the English language has no finer term than, "Excuse me", "Thank you", and "Please". They should be a part of the equipment of every boy. They are not "weasel words", and neither are they effeminate. They are certainly no less appropriate in the mouth of a robust, virile youth than in that of a sissy. They may be spoken obsequiously, but they are not obsequious words. They are wholesome, brief, sunshiny words. They make life richer and better for both user and hearer. Says Montaigue, the great French essayist, "Whenever a savage becomes polite he is no longer a savage. He has crossed over the boundary into civilization."

The case of the office boy, mentioned at the outset, brings to mind the statement of a well-known police judge in a high school address:

"There is, as I see it, no essential difference in the attitude of a boy who bumps into me on the street, or in a store, and fails to apologize, and the automobilist who hits me and refuses to stop to see whether I am injured."

Consider for yourself the meaning of these two instances taken verbatim from life:

"Harold," called his mother, "there's an apple for you on the dining-room table."

"Well," snarled Harold, "why didn't you say so before?"

Ray's mother overtook him at the front door: "I wish you wouldn't go out to play yet. There isn't a stick of kindling or a scuttle of coal in the house. If you will attend to that now you may play until supper."

"Thank you, mother," said Ray, as he started to bring in the required fuel.

The impolite boy is but the forerunner of the middle-aged cynic and the old-aged grouch. Thank you, excuse me, and please, fitly spoken by a boy merely suggests that a refined and manly man is coming along presently.

The Film-O-Scope With 125 Moving Picture Views

Almost As Good As A Movie Show

HERE is something we feel sure you will find a most delightful substitute for the movies—the wonderful new Film-O-Scope with a powerful magnifying lens—and with it we give you free a big collection of 125 Views from real moving picture films. These views, when looked at through the Scope, are magnified many times and stand out as real and life-like as they appear on the screen in regular moving picture theaters. Leading movie "stars" and scenes from their best pictures are included in the collection and there are no two alike. As one view after another is placed in the Scope and seen through the magnifying lens, one experiences about the same pleasure as that derived from a regular movie show and as the pictures may be repeated as often as desired, they furnish a never-ending, joyful entertainment for the young folks, keeping them amused instructed, and out of mischief indoors.

Boys and girls in the cities are delighted with this new Film-O-Scope and the wonderful collection of 125 entertaining and exciting views that come with it, so we have purchased a supply of them to give away to COMFORT'S boys and girls who live in the country and small towns where the Scope is not being sold. Tires

IT is frequently stated that tires are the greatest expense in connection with the operation of a car. While this is probably true to a certain extent it cannot be denied that the present pneumatic tire has been developed to a point where very satisfactory service is assured providing the driver will do his part. Nothing which the writer can think of will give continued service if the owner xpects all service and in return will give no care. Stand for a few minutes on any well traveled highway and notice the drivers drop the tires into ruts, hit stones, skid, etc., and t e observer will marvel that tires can withstand such abuse.

The maintaining of the proper air pressure is the first important matter for which the driver only is responsible. Find out the air pressure recommended by the tire manufacturer and keep a tire gauge handy so that the pressure can be definitely determined and not left to guess. Cord and fabric tires of the same size do not require the same air pressure; so if both kinds are being used do not inflate all tires to the same pressure. The tire manufacturers' recommended pressure is the only safe one to follow. The alignment of the front wheels is also up to the driver to watch.

Coming into sharp contact with the curbstone or other obstructions is liable to bend the steering spindle slightly but sufficiently to throw the wheels out of alignment, a condition commonly referred to as "not tracking." When the treads on the front tires wear out quickly the indication is that the front wheels are not tracking, and they should be adjusted. The instruction book furnished with the car usually treats on this subject and gives directions for adjusting the wheels.

Most everyone is familiar with puncture. It is caused by a nail or other sharp article piercing the tire and breaking through the tube. When a puncture is experienced the cause of it should be ascertained. Run the hand slowly along the inside of the casing and feel for a protruding nail, piece of glass, etc. Sometimes a minute inspection of the casing is necessary to find the cause of the puncture, but it is generally time wasted to repair and replace the tube without first finding and removing the cause.

A condition referred to as a stone bruise is caused by driving over stones or hitting them at high speeds so that a portion of the rubber tread is knocked off, usually exposing the fabric. A vulcanized repair on the casing is about the best remedy.

If the tear or hole is not repaired, one or more large lumps may appear on the sides of the casing. This condition is generally termed "sand blister." It is due to dirt and water having worked in the cut to the fabric or cords with deteriorating effect. When the blisters appear the usefulness of the tire is on the decline and the condition could have been averted if the gash or cut had been vulcanized at an earlier date.

Rim cut is due to underinflation, and no one but the driver is responsible. The rim has run on the side walls of the tire and cut into the rubber and fabric. After being rim cut the life of the tire is problematical and a blowout is to be expected at an early date.

A blow-out is a condition where a portion of the tire collapses and the tube comes through. Usually the tire is ruined although in a fabric tire a new section may be put in by an expert tire man. The life of such a repair may be of short or long duration and the casing will always be unreliable. The average blow-out is the result of the casing not receiving the proper attention when first cut.

Bear in mind that the outside rubber covering of the tire does not hold pressure. The fabric or cords take the pressure and must be sealed from dirt, water, etc., by a complete rubber covering. If this covering is allowed to become cut and not repaired, the seal is broken and the outside elements start to have their deteriorating effects upon the real body of the tire.

Maintain a correct pressure and keep the tread whole, and satisfaction will be obtained from the present day pneumatic tire.

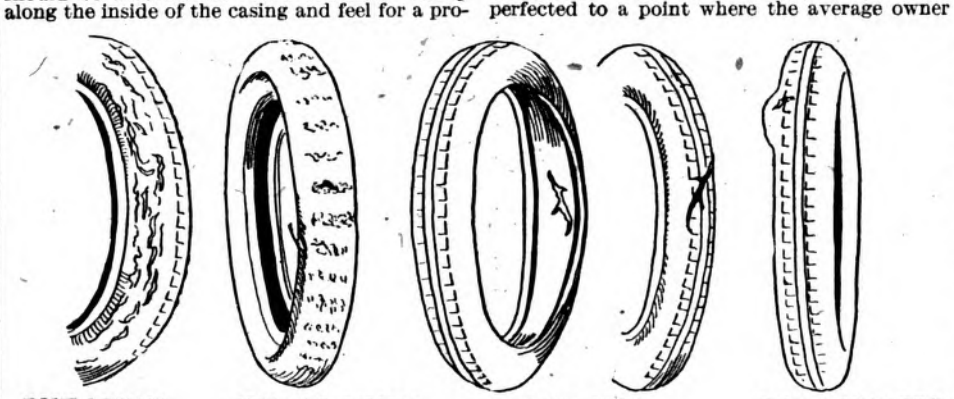
Only Tube Blows Out

When only the tube blows out and the outer casing remains intact, the indication is that the tube was pinched when being mounted on the rim. A good plan is to inflate the tube just a trifle after placing it in the casing and before mounting on the rim. This method will smooth out the tube and place it in proper position in the casing, and guards against pinching or otherwise injuring the tube when mounting.

Leaky Tire Valve

Should a car or truck be placed in the garage at night with all tires inflated and should you find one tire flat or almost flat in the morning, it is good policy before jumping at the conclusion that the tire is punctured to test the valve. Jack up the wheel and pump a little air into the tire. Remove t e pump, wet the finger in the mouth and rub the well wetted finger over the mouth of the valve stem. If bubbles appear, try screwing the valve down using the slotted end of the valve cap for this purpose. Again test the valve as above suggested and if bubbles still appear, a new valve is needed. If however, the test shows the valve to be tight, then the tire should be removed from the rim and an inspection made for puncture or pinched tube.

Gasolene Tank Location



When automobiles were first brought out the gasolene tank was usually to be found under the front seat. While some manufacturers still produce cars with the tank in this location, a gasolene tank suspended at the rear of the chassis has gained public favor and is the location used by the majority of car manufacturers today.

There are several objections to the gasolene t nk under the seat: One is that a low front seat over a tank is almost impossible. The space unde the seat is almost entirely gone when the gas tank is installed there. When the tank is being replenished with fuel, the occupants of the front seat must get out of the car or at least take a very uncomfortable position so that the cushion may be raised to get at the tank. S ould the tank b filled to overflowing there is danger of the gasolene running on th car body and injuring the finish.

Still another objection which favored the changing of the location is that tanks, when placed under the front seat, feed the fuel by gravity to the carbureter. If the fuel is allowed to become low in the tank and the car is perated on a long steep grade there may not be enough head to the gasolene to flow by gravity to the carbureter.

When the tank is located at the rear of the chassis, the vacuum system is usually adopted for the transferring of the gasolene to an auxiliary tank which is elevated very close to the carbureter. The vacuum system has been perfected to a point where the average owner does not know the meanin of trouble with this feed. It can surely be said to be reliable. The front seat can be dropped to any point desired and still there is always a space under t for the carrying of tools, curtains, etc.

The one chief objection to the tank in the rear, as the writer sees it, is that a rear end c llision may dent or break the tank unless a bumpe is used to protect it. There appear to be few accidents of this kind, and for passenger cars, the tank suspended at the rear of the chassis is well loacted.

RUT-WORN CHAIN INJURY BLOWOUT SAND-BLISTER

Answers to Inquiries

WORN CYLINDERS.—My 1917 Ford has a piston slat. Could I remedy this by taking a used piston, sawing it in two from top to bottom, putting in a spring to make the halves press against the cylinder wall, and use it thus with valve-grinding compound to grind the cylinders to a larger bore and true circle? Could I get good results from such a job?
J. F. H., Grainfield, Kansas.

A.—I certainly am not in favor of the repair method outlined by you as it sounds more like a makeshift than a permanent cure. If t e cylinders have worn oval shape they should be reground and new oversize pistons and rings installed. The price of new pistons and rings is trivial when the assured service which they would render i taken into consideration.

ONE PISTON KNOCKS.—My 1914 model 32 Hupmobile uses too much oil. It is equipped with Leith carburetor and oil lead on opposite side. Is there any way to regulate the oil consumption? (2) Also one piston knocks, although I have new pistons and wrist pins, but one bushing is worn and thinner than the others. Is it possible that this causes the knocks, although all are tight?
T. J. M., Ingomar, Mont.

A.—You do not state the mileage you are receiving to the quart of oil and therefore it is impossible for me to state what remedy is needed. The expression "excess of oil" can refer to the consumption of a quart of oil every 25 miles or every 100 miles depending on the mileage which the owner expects to receive to the quart of oil. You also do not refer to any irregular engine operation due to the excessive use of oil and you will therefore appreciate the impossible of proffering suggestions. Regarding the knock which you believe is caused by Nos. 1 and 2 pistons, you state that new pisto s and wrist pins have been installed. If the w rk was not properly handled the installation of new parts will not correct the condition. If the cylinder bores were worn oval shape you will probably agree that a new round piston will not adop this shape and will continue to slap. Before instalIing new pistons, the cylinder bores should be carefully measured as regrinding may be necessary. Also if the cylinder bores were round they may be a trifle oversize and require larger pistons than the standard size. Regarding the bushings, this can only be determined by measurement. If a bushing is worn it should of course be replaced with a new one and reamed to the proper size.

CAN FORD BE DRIVEN SLOWLY IN HIGH?—My 1922 Ford touring car has had good care and is in good condition. I sometimes have to drive it through congested city streets, behind high-priced cars that go very slowly, and, of course, it is difficult to run a Ford in high at such a slow pace. In order to drive a Ford as slowly as possible in high: (1) Should the spark-plug gap be any wider or narrower than usual? (2) Should the gas mixture be richer than for greater speed? (3) Could one drive slower on the battery, without engine missing, than on the magneto? H. L. M., Siloam Springs, Ark.

A.—You are almost going out of your class in aspiring to do something in which the owner of a high priced car delights. Idling down smoothly in high is a condition which requires that a combination of parts must function perfectly. The ignition spark must be hot, the carburetor accurately set, the valves and pistons compression tight, etc. It is the proper functioning of a number of el ments together and no one particular part which brings about this desirable condition. I am not trying to establish the impression that your car will not operate smoothly when idled way down on high but bring out the fact that a car must be tuned up finely for a performance of this kind. When you are running on magneto at slow speed the current is the weakest and naturally the spark is not as hot as when running at a higher speed. For slow speed work, I believe the battery would give the hotter spark. I do not believe that you will benefit any by changing the spark plug gap. A slightly richer mixture is desirable for slow speed. You have probably noticed whe making a long run at an average speed that it is possible to cut down on the carburetor without effecting the engine operation.

FUNCTION OF GOVERNOR ON TRUCK.—Will a Nash or International auto-truck, or one of any other make, pull as well without a governor as it will with a governor? If not, please explain why.
G. J., Grand Ridge, Florida.

A.—A governor is not placed on an engine with intent to have any effect on the pulling power. The governor is installed so that the truck cannot be operated in excess to a certain predetermined speed. Being mounted on solid tires, the manufacturer knows that the truck will be jolted to pieces if it is operated at high speeds. There are several types of governors some of which govern the engine speed while others govern the truck speed. If the governor is on the engine the speed of the engine is limited It cannot be operated in excess to a certain number of revolutions per minute. If the engine is capable of a greater speed, a governor may prove detrimental to power. On a hard pull and operating in low gear speeding up the engine would produce greater power. If, however, the engine is governed the speed cannot be increased beyond the point where the governor is effective. When the governor controls the speed of the truck rather than the speed of the engine, the engine may be run at any speed desired so long as it does not drive the truck at a rate where the governor would be effective.

SUBSTITUTED MAGNETO FOR BATTERY.—As I run my 1918 model Maxwell only a few months in the summer, the battery proved unsatisfactory and I run on a Bosch magneto. What are my chances for lights? When my batteries gave out I put on the Bosch and failed to ground the generator; so I think it is out of order. Could I have it repaired and get lights from it as a Ford does from its magneto? R. H., Wetumpka, Ala.

A.—The installation of a magneto and the elimination of the battery has deprived you of the lighting source. Inasmuch as you failed to short the generator after removing the battery, the chances are that the armature is burned out. An expensive repair will probably be needed to fix up this instrument. You cannot run directly from the generator to the lights. You are making backward strides in endeavoring to do away with electrical equipment which is far superior to that used when the automobile industry was in its infancy. You could, of course, install acetylene head lamps, kerosene tail lamp, use the hand crank for starting, etc. My recommendation would be that you have the generator repaired, install a new battery and enjoy some of the features which are present day advantages. If you have your battery properly cared for during the idle period, it will give satisfactory service for many seasons.

THERE are so many questions this month that I've just time to say "Howdy girls," instead of the long, long lecture I had planned to give you. It's too bad 'cause by next month I'll have forgotten all that I was going to say. Perhaps it is just as well, I never did like lectures myself and doubtless you feel the same way, and the knowledge that I believe in each one of you and want you to do the right thing, is better than a dozen lectures.

ELINOR, WASHINGTON.—Yes, Elinor, I agree with you: it is a hard old world for a girl. As the Staley Journal so aptly puts it—

"If you love a man, he isn't worth it.
If you don't love him, you don't know what you want.
If you lead him on, you're a flirt.
If you ignore him, you're heartless.
If he has money, you're mercenary.
If he hasn't any money, you're foolish.
If he's old, you're robbing the grave.
If he's young, you're robbing the cradle.
If you stay at home, you're an old maid.
If you don't, you're a rounder.
For the love of Mike—what's a poor girl to do?"

TWO GIRLS, OKLAHOMA.—If you are "modest and a little bit bashful" please stay that way. A modest, bashful girl is such a rarity nowadays. Tell your parents and the young men they want you to marry that you consider yourselves too young and that you want the privilege of looking about a bit before committing yourselves for life. And don't start this tour of inspection for five years at least. You appear to be sensible little girls with every promise of becoming sensible women. Don't get side-tracked.

TROUBLED MARY, TENNESSEE.—There's something the matter with your head I fear, to be in love with a man who is wild, lazy, a spendthrift and a drunkard. Aside from these faults he is not so bad, if you don't mind a little dishonorable thing like making love to you while married to another. And it isn't so honorable of you to let him, come to think about it. Why do you care if he loves you now, or if he ever did? If he had he wouldn't have married another. You should thank your lucky stars that your parents made you wait. If he had married you the chances are he would be making love to some other girl now. Brace up, Mary, take a tuck in your spine and forget all about such a worthless person. Don't let him kiss you any more. Tell him that if he hasn't any honor or decency, you have.

BROWN EYES, ARIZONA.—Serves you right, you can't expect to go on telling a real he-man to stay away, and get away with it every time. If you were at fault, admit it and ask him to come back, or, rather, ask him to come back first and do your explaining afterwards. He will help you out.

HAPPY VIRGINIAN.—It was a shock, but a pleasant shock, to know that one girl in the world is glad that her parents are strict with her. You are fortunate to have such parents. I'm holding you up as an example to other girls. They'll dislike you, I know, but it is for a good cause and I'm sure you won't mind.

UNDECIDED BROWNIE.—It would be better to talk with your brother, I should think, and enlist his aid. He could then find some excuse for no longer employing this man to whom your father objects. Thus you would not be compelled to see him as often as you must now that he is employed by your brother and living in the same house with you. What are brothers for if not to help sisters?

CATHERINE.—Your letter has been sent to the Home Lawyer. Look in that department for answer.

UNDECIDED.—(Another one.) Because of the way you have used him you can't expect him to think you care for him, and he is doubtless tired telling you how much he cares for you. If you love him and think he still loves you (I don't know why he should), don't be too "independent" to show that you care. People pride themselves upon being independent when they are just plain stubborn and pig-headed. When I advise you to show that you care for him it is with the proviso that he is a suitable person in every way, so far as family, position and morals are concerned, and all the other requisites that go to make up a good husband.

TRAILING ARBUTUS, TENNESSEE.—If he let you read letters from other girls it is only reasonable to suppose that he would let other girls read your letters. It wasn't an honorable thing for him to have done and for that matter it wasn't so honorable of you to read the letters from other girls. Why bother with him, particularly as you aren't in love with him. Be careful what you write in all future letters.

TROUBLED SWEETHEART, TEXAS.—My dear girl, you can't afford not to give up your position if your employer has such an influence over you as you say he has. He is married and his protested love for you is selfish and dishonorable and will lead to worse than unhappiness for you if allowed to go on. As for his threat to make trouble for you if you marry anyone else, that's only cowardly talk. He wouldn't dare to do it because at the same time he would be making more trouble for himself with his wife. Would your country sweetheart (I like him) understand if you told him all? I wish you would, and that he would go in and give your employer the beating up of his life, and I'd like to be there to see it. Now you know what nationality I am!

LONELY BROWN EYES, TENN.—Why do you want him back? Hasn't he caused you enough trouble and worry already? Of course if you like to be upset and worried all the time, take him back.

HAPPY KID.—Quit a fellow because he didn't come to see you when you had the mumps? I should say not! Hang onto him. He possessed delicacy and tactfulness to a marked degree. Maybe you were good looking when you had the mumps, but if you were you are an exception to the general rule. (2) You can't force an old school chum to write to you unless he wants to; so there isn't much you can do about it unless you give him the mumps just to get even with him. (3) It isn't fair to say a girl is an old maid when she reaches a certain age I've seen some old maids of twenty and young girls of thirty and married women who were old maids at heart. Figure it out for yourself.

JOYOUS GIRL, TEXAS.—It would seem that two jealous natured people should get along nicely together. I've always been sorry for the jealous person who is married to one who isn't a bit jealous and can't understand how terrible it is. You can sympathize with each other and help each other to overcome this trait. The chances are good that you'll quarrel less after marriage than before. Be sensible about this jealousy and help each other to overcome it just as you would help each other to overcome any other disease that threatened your happiness.

BROWN EYES AND CURLY HAIR, BRISTOL.—You should have invited him to call again, just as you should invite anybody who comes to your home. That's just being polite. But it seems that he would have found some excuse for calling during the two years since his first call, if he really wanted to come again. (3) No reason in the world why a brother and sister shouldn't marry a sister and brother, provided they aren't cousins.

HEART BROKEN KID, ARKANSAS.—If everyone says he is "no account" and a do-nothing, you'd better investigate matters thoroughly before marrying him. There must be some reason for these remarks. (2) Finish school by all means.

G. M., MISSOURI.—There is no reason why, under the circumstances, you shouldn't write a friendly letter to him. If he still cares it will give him an excuse for coming back to you. You couldn't really expect him to write after all the discouraging things you said to him. He may be like lots of other men—thinks a woman means what she says.

BROWN EYES, MISSOURI.—This is what she writes: "Has I have wroten you and never got any answer, I've got me a nice bowe." Now that you've got a nice bowe you'd better get yourself a nice spelling book and a nice little grammar and study them. After a year's study write to me again and I'll give you my honest opinion as to whether this nice bowe, or another one, loves you or not.

BLONDIE, CONN.—It is all very well to say that "the sea is deep and there are lots of fishes," but remember, fish don't bite if the bait is stale. I'm glad the good looking fellow is conceited and stingy. You deserve it for dancing with him when you had promised to dance with another fellow. You owe him an apology.

BRUNETTE, CONN.—Human nature is a funny thing; we want what we can't have and don't want what we can have. You want this certain fellow, and he knows it and doesn't want you. If he thought you didn't care for him he might be more interested in you; but is he really worth the effort? If you and your chum, at the mature age of sixteen years, think there is no harm in going to dances unchaperoned and in letting fellows kiss you, there's nothing more for me to say. I, at many years older than sixteen, think differently.

DIMPLES, OKLAHOMA.—Surely there could be no harm in a girl of eighteen kissing a man of fifty, a nice daughterly kiss, with other people present, but as for marrying him—that's different. I don't approve of that at all.

UGLY BETTY, OKLAHOMA.—Don't marry him on the strength of his promise to stop drinking after you are married. They seldom do, and you would be laying up a choice assortment of trouble and unhappiness for yourself. (3) If it is too stormy or rainy for your sweetheart to go home, your father and mother should ask him to stay all night. The invitation should come from them and not from you.

Good by Girls,

COUSIN MARION.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and Kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

LAND OF FLOWERS, Florida.—In setting a table for your home dinner for six persons, you should first of all give thought to the convenience of serving your guests—as you are without servant to assist. For this reason we think you should avoid the serving of a soup and have your meal consist for its principal courses of a roast, potatoes in some form, such vegetables as you may prefer, a salad, a simple dessert and coffee. Of course you may make the additions of any homemade jelly, conserve, relishes or pickles which your pantry or cellar offers. We give no specific menu because you did not ask for this. By arranging your meal as above, you could have all food except the dessert on the table when your guests seat themselves, and you would only have to disturb things by rising once—at the time of clearing the board for the arrival of the dessert and coffee. If your husband is not at the table, you should have the roast placed before you to serve. You will find it convenient to have a portion of this already sliced so that you will not have to carve at the table. It is best to ask some member of your family or a guest, who is an intimate friend, to aid you by serving and passing the vegetables and other dishes.

Knives are placed at the right of the service plate in setting your table, and forks and spoons on the left. If you have bread and butter plates, a convenient custom, the napkin can be placed on this with a roll, biscuit or slice of bread folded within it. This will aid by doing away with the first passing of whatever bread stuff you serve. It will help, also, to have a glass already filled with water at each place. Use some not too large green plant or fern for a centerpiece to your table, or better yet such flowers as may be seasonable or convenient for your purpose. Aid the pleasure and ease of your guests and of yourself by a simple and sincere desire to avoid "style" and ceremony in serving your meal. Let them feel that it is a pleasant occasion for you and not a burden of additional labor to have them as your guests. (2) The leaves of lettuce which are the accompaniment of a salad are meant to be eaten as well as the other parts of the salad as served and for which the lettuce is used as base. You should eat your salad with a fork.

A LOVESICK GIRL, Grundy, Va.—What is the use of trying to hate this boy when you say you "love him dearer than a boy was ever loved?" Love and hate can not be mixed, or traded about in this way. We think the real difficulty is that this boy looks upon you as a "kid" and so doesn't take your affection seriously. And isn't he right about his view of you? You are but a child yet, though we do not overlook the fact that children can love. Try and forget your worship of this boy for about four years. Then if he still means the same to you, it is very likely you may mean something to him. At any rate you will not be the child to him that you must seem now when he sees you with older girls nearer his own age.

BLUE EYES OF ALABAMA.—The cigarette is a form of tobacco that has made a complete invasion, and a boy can smoke one when with a girl, or when in her home. He must, however, consider her wishes in the matter, and should ask her first if he may smoke, or if she "minds" the cigarette. He should also observe what might be the prejudices of the girl's parents against tobacco. All persons do not like tobacco smoke, and habituated smokers are often forgetful of this, or cheerfully disregard possible objection. Personally we object to the odor of tobacco while we are eating. We do not consider either tobacco or smoke as proper flavors for food. Yet smoking in public eating places is almost universal. The votes and influence of women can help in this evil we believe.

A BRIDE-TO-BE, Kansas.—At a home wedding, such as you describe, a bride should remove her veil after the ceremony and before she partakes of the supper which is to be served. (2) Yes, you should send announcements to friends and near-relatives whom you have not invited or who might be prevented in some way from attending the ceremony.

L. C., Mayfield, Ky.—The constancy or inconstancy of the heart of an eighteen-year-old boy is a variable thing and not a proper subject for serious analysis, we fear. Haven't you been out before with other eighteen-year-old boys? And it is perfectly possible for the veriest novice to love two girls at once and swear to each that she alone is his heart's desire! It is quite probable that this boy's affections are wandering afield a little so that his calls with you have dropped from three a week to one. This you can record as a fall in Love's barometer. And yet the change in the wind of young affection may swing back to you. There's no telling. Just be nice to him and don't be too jealous of the other girl—and wait for the change in the weather-vane.

M. P., Charlevoix, Mich.—Read our answer to L. C. Mayfield, Ky. You can not possess a young boy's heart in his days of youth and dalliance. Are you sure that you do not like to have more than one boy come to see you? How can he tell that he likes you best unless he has a chance to compare you with other girls? If he "speaks as if nothing had happened," we advise you to speak as if nothing had happened also. "Least said is soonest mended"—even hearts which are easily damaged and often must be repaired.

BROWN EYES, Pennsylvania.—As to the finger on which a gentleman should wear his wedding ring, we answer that it is most proper that he wear no wedding ring at all. This is a point best left for the bride alone, we think. If you have a quiet home wedding with only immediate relatives present, you should not attempt to serve any wedding breakfast. You can, however, serve refreshments in a simple manner by having the table on which these are arranged—leaving your guests to help themselves, the men waiting on the ladies, etc.

The Pretty Girls

n the water. Immediately the electric current shoots through. When the hair is dead, you take your fingers out of the water and then slowly draws the needle. It is through being careful about having the current on while the needle is being put in and taken out that scary sensation results, and the pain is greater. So pay strict attention to your operator and be perfectly still as she uses the needle. For home treatment of superfluous hair, try using ammonia on the hairy patch, and peroxide the next day, letting the liquid dry on. The peroxide will bleach the hair, and the ammonia dries it up and kills it in time. It is a slow process and takes patience and perseverance. If the skin gets irritated at any time from the applications, stop them for a few days and rub on cold cream.

TENNESSEE—The quickest way to get rid of blackheads is to bathe daily, and to rub on a little cold cream, massaging the face throughly especially where the blackheads are. This softens and loosens them. Then with a soft cloth about each finger, press the blackhead between them and squeeze it out. When you have removed all that will come out, dab the face with oatmeal which has been made into paste with peroxide of hydrogen. Let it stay on a few minutes, then wash off with warm water. Massage the face with cold cream, to keep the skin soft and the blackheads loosened. When you take your bath daily, friction the skin of the body with a towel to stimulate the circulation and induce the pores to throw off their contents. For a dark skin, use not a white powder but either a brunette powder or flesh color—a "brunette powder" is of the standard brands you see advertised in the good magazines—then after wiping off the face with a pad of cotton until there is no trace of cream, apply the powder. If you will do this every time before using powder, it will be good for the skin. The preparation you mention is all right for shampooing, and so is a liquid soap by shaving half a bar of white household soap in a quart of boiling water and letting it dissolve on the stove. After wetting the hair thoroughly pour a little of this liquid on at a time, and work rinsing afterwards most carefully.

Simulated Shell Cameo Brooch of rare old antique design given to you for only two subscriptions.

Reward No. 1492.

IF you have a genuine old cameo brooch which has been handed down to you from your grandmother or your great-great-grandmother you will delight in comparing it with this beautifully formed imitation of the cameo brooch, the exclusive design of which has every appearance of a genuine old heirloom of precious association.

Whether you compare this brooch with the one you will agree with us, we believe, that in the delicately formed features on the background of a flesh pink gives this simulated shell cameo a wonderful beauty all its own.

The cameo is held tightly in place by a gilt frame which is embellished with ten clustering tiny simulated pearls. The whole effect is delightfully pleasing. You will have an instinctive desire to tuck this brooch away among your most treasured possessions or to save it for special occasions only, but whether you use it or not, it should give you many years of happy satisfaction. The illustration shows the brooch in its actual size—the size most popular when cameos are worn.

For the time being we are able to offer this cameo at an extraordinarily low subscription rate. Read the following offer and make sure that you get your cameo now.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you free by parcel post prepaid, this Cameo Brooch. Reward No. 1492.

Banishing pain
by reducing congestion

Millions are now using this simple treatment to stop pain. Sloan's, applied without rubbing, penetrates and produces a warming sensation. It stimulates new, fresh blood to and through the aching part. This breaks up the congestion, and since congestion has caused the pain—quick, grateful relief follows.

The world over, Sloan's stops rheumatic twinges and muscular aches. It eases aching backs and sharp neuralgic pains. Good, too, for colds in chest.

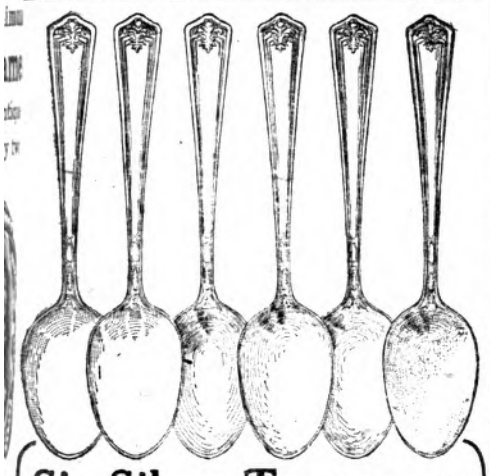
RITA or, the OUTCAST SISTER

By LIBBIE SPRAGUE PHILLIPS

SPECIAL SALE PRICE with a six (6) months' subscription to THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION ONLY 25 CENTS.



This Book contains one of this noted author's best novels.

Pressed close against the window pane was a wan, white face.

The pathos of this story sweeps all before it. It touches the heart of humanity everywhere. Even the man with a heart of stone learns from this story that deep down under the cold, hard strata of stone, he has in his heart a deep well of human sympathy for the erring one; that he has also a heart capable of love and admiration for the good and noble character of Luella, the gentle, loving, self-sacrificing sister. Righteous indignation is aroused toward Silas Lockwood, her relentless and unnatural father. The heart's emotions like a great ocean billow, rolls on from the beginning to end of the book; when you lay it down and say blessed is God who rules over all for the good of all. Thousands will want to read this book and pass it on to their friends. Libbie Sprague Phillips writes exclusively for THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION; has done so for 20 years. One minister has furnished it with sermons for 17 years; other writers have contributed regularly for years. THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION is 45 years old. The years of continued service of its writers show that our magazine is one of fixed and standard worth. We know you will enjoy reading it. THIS OFFER of magazine 6 months and book, for 25 cents is made to get new trial subscribers. Book without paper 12 cents.

Six Silver Teaspoons

The Ever Popular "Avon" Design

BY buying in large quantities we are enabled to offer our readers this handsome set of six teaspoons for the ridiculously small club mentioned below. They are six inches long, made of pure nickel-silver, so there is no brass to show through, and they will never have that dingy or tarnished appearance even after years of constant use. The design is the beautiful "Avon" deeply embossed on the handles.

The rich design and splendid wearing qualities of these teaspoons combine to make this the most attractive premium offered in years. Our illustration does not do them justice. They must be seen to be appreciated. We know they will exceed your highest expectations.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you six of these fine Nickel-Silver Teaspoons free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 9682.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. H. H., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, and no parent, the surviving widow would be entitled to receive the whole estate, subject to the payment of his debts and the expenses of administration.

Mrs. L. D. B., Maine.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the parents of the child you mention are entitled to the custody of their child, provided they are fit persons to have such custody, and that you have only a civil claim against them for the amount due you for taking care of the child, of course, if you can substantiate by the proper evidence that the parents are unfit persons to have the custody of the child, the courts might award such custody to you upon the proper showing. We think if you own the property you live in you are entitled to continue to hold same.

Mrs. L. A., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that it was the duty of the landlord to put you in possession of the property you leased from him, and upon his default thereof he became liable to you for such damages as you can prove you suffered by reason thereof, provided you have not subsequently waived your claim for damages.

E. J. M., Maryland.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that twenty years adverse possession gives title to land.

Mrs. S. E., California.—Under the laws of Kentucky, we are of the opinion that all ordinary actions for the recovery of real estate must be brought within fifteen years, and that no disability whatever can extend the time longer than thirty years; action to recover property sold for taxes should be brought within five years.

Mrs. A. W., Ohio.—If the will you mention was legally drawn and executed and if the testator, at the time of making the will, possessed testamentary capacity and was not under undue influence, we think it would be valid regardless of how long a time elapsed between its execution and the death of the testator. We think if the witnesses are dead it will be necessary to prove their handwriting.

Mrs. G. H. B., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children as his heirs at law and next of kin, his widow would receive one-third of the real and personal estate, subject to the payment of his debts and the expenses of administration, regardless of whether she was a first or second wife, and the right of his children would not depend upon whether they were children of the widow, or children of a former marriage. (2) We think if you are the only child of your widowed mother, you would receive her whole estate, subject to payment of debts and expenses, provided you survive her and she died without a will, but that if she possesses testamentary capacity and no undue influence is exercised upon her she can disinherit you by will or otherwise dispose of her property as she may see fit.

Mrs. M. E. B., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the wife of the man you mention refuses to join in the deed of the property and if she did join in the mortgage you hold upon this property, it may be advisable for you to foreclose your mortgage in order to procure a good and marketable title to the property.

Mrs. M. A. B., Washington.—We do not think you can now substantiate any interest in either of the properties you mention if you have neglected to prosecute your claim for a period of thirty-three or more years.

Mrs. L. A. T., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations runs against an action brought upon a specialty, agreement, contract, or promise in writing in five years, but that the statute ceases to operate in such actions while the plaintiff operates under a legal disability, or while defendant absents or conceals himself, and that the payment of any part of the principal or interest, or any acknowledgment of an existing liability, debt or claim, or any promise to pay the same in writing revives the liability. (2) We think an examination of the deed you mention would be necessary in order to determine your rights thereunder.

Mrs. C. W. B., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your grandmother had a legal right to deed her property to her son, without your consent, provided she, at the time, possessed mental capacity and was not under undue influence of some other person.

J. C., Oklahoma.—If your friend has neglected to prosecute his claim for the recovery of the property you mention for a long period of years we think he could not now establish any right or interest in same.

L. E. M., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the real and personal property which any woman in your state may own at the time of her marriage and all the income thereon together with any property she may thereafter receive by descent, devise, or bequest, or the gift of any person except her husband, shall remain her sole and separate property, notwithstanding her marriage, and not be subject to the disposal of her husband or liable for his debts, and that she may, while married, carry on any trade or business, and perform any labor or services, on her sole and separate account, and the earnings therefrom shall be her sole and separate property, and may be used and invested by her in her own name, but that she is not entitled to pay for services performed by her for her husband, and her husband is entitled to hold and own such of her property as she may voluntarily turn over to him; during the marriage she has no interest in his property except that she is entitled to be supported by him, and is entitled to inheritance rights from his estate.

Mrs. M. E. D., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a married woman has, during the marriage, absolute control of her separate property, and in dealing with her husband she may take title directly from him and may loan him money and take transfers of property in payment from him, but that such property as she voluntarily presents him becomes his property. We think if you advanced the money for the purchase of the property you mention from your separate property, the title to same should run direct to you and not to your husband.

Mrs. G. J., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations runs against actions brought to enforce the payment for goods bought upon an open account within six years from the time of the last purchase or payment on account or other evidence of indebtedness. We do not think that a woman's marriage relieves her from the payment of her debts.

L. B., Nebraska.—We think a marriage license must be procured in the state where the same is issued.

Miss H. S., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the parents are entitled to the custody and control of their minor children.

Mrs. C. B., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving husband and children, her estate would go to such husband and children, the husband receiving one-third if he is the parent of all of the children of the deceased and one-fourth in case she leaves children by two or more marriages, but that children of the husband by a former marriage would have no interest in her estate, except that in turn they might become entitled to share in such portion of the property as the father inherited from their stepmother.

Mrs. B., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, his widow is entitled to receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate and one-third of the personal estate, absolutely, the balance of the estate going to his children in equal shares, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

Mrs. L. S., Illinois.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion that if your husband has no property, it will be necessary for you to locate him before you can enforce your claim against him for your support and for the support of your small child.

L. M. P., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the holder of the second mortgage you mention would have a legal right to foreclose same upon any default thereunder, but that any sale of the property under the foreclosure of such second mortgage would be subject and subordinate to the lien of the first mortgage property.

B. G., Missouri.—Under the laws of Oklahoma, we are of the opinion that married women have all the property rights of unmarried ones, except that they must be joined by the husband in the conveyance of the homestead when owned by them.

M. N. S., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that an examination of the deed or will would be necessary to determine the disposition of the remainder interest in the property you mention, if such instrument directs that the remainder interest in the property shall go to the children of the life tenant, living at the time of his death, it would seem to include his children by both marriages.

A. W. M., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his widow after payment of debts and expenses, and in addition to certain small allowances, would receive dower of one-half of the real estate, and one-half of the personal property absolutely, if the estate be a new acquisition, as against collateral heirs, but as against creditors, one-third, if the estate is ancestral she would receive one-third of the personalty, absolutely, and one-third of the real estate for life.

R. H., Idaho.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention all belonged to your father, you acquired no interest therein upon the death of your mother as it would have been necessary for her to have survived him in order to have acquired a vested inheritance right in his property.

The Modern Farmer

According to a statement issued by Prof. F. C. Sears, of Amherst Agricultural College, in Massachusetts, the apples are in every way perfect specimens of a previously unknown seedless and coreless type that is highly desirable. According to this authority, there is little doubt but that the new apples can be propagated by extensive grafting, once the parent tree or trees are located. Should this be the case, the advent of a coreless and seedless apple on the market may have a profound effect upon the whole apple-growing industry. Already it is reported that the discoverer has received large offers from nurserymen for the exclusive rights to the new apple, and another year should prove its worth beyond a doubt.

Fence Building Hints

Fences often need attention in the spring after frost has left the ground. Sometimes it is found that, what with frost heaving of posts and wear and tear of old age, a new fence must be built in place of an old one that has served for a number of years. There is no greater aggravation to the farmer than a fence—especially if it happens to be a neighbor's neglected one—which permits "breachy" stock free access to growing crops, nor is there any other one thing about the farm that causes more lawsuits beginning with lost temper and ending with lost friendship. Therefore we believe that a few fence building hints are timely.

The life and usefulness of a fence depends fully as much upon the way it is built as upon the material of which it is made. Likewise, the same materials properly used will last longer than if haphazardly handled. In choosing woven wire it has been found that the heavier grades, even though they cost more, are less expensive in the long run. They outlast the lighter grades, stand stretching better and the galvanizing holds much better. For general purposes wire not smaller than No. 9 will be the best to buy.

Manufacturers of every kind of fence-wire from barbed wire to "bull proof" woven wire, specify that wire must be stretched tight. There lies the great trouble, for the farmer's idea of tight falls far below the amount of stretching the manufacturer had in mind. A tight fence needs at least a pull of a thousand pounds; several thousand will be better, and there is little danger that it will be injured by getting it too tight. For a 42-inch woven-wire fence a pull of 5,000 pounds can safely be applied, with a really well-built fence as the result. Of course, this requires strong, well-anchored corner posts that will not "give" under the strain. This "high-tension" stretching may be obtained with special stretchers, with a team or tractor hitched to the end of the wire, or with a block and tackle. A fence that is stretched tightly enough will sing in a high-pitched key when tapped with the hammer or "plucked" with the hand. Stretched in this manner, securely stapled to good posts well set, and with anchored or braced corner posts to withstand the stretching strain, there will be little further need for fence worries.

A word about gates. An otherwise good fence may be a failure because of poor gates, or because the posts at each side have not been well set and side-braced, permitting sagging. Remember that "a chain is no stronger than its weakest link," nor is a fence any stronger than its weakest spot. Therefore see that posts on either side of gates are big and strong and well braced—as sturdy as the corner posts, for gate supports must bear almost as heavy a strain as corner posts. Frequently it will be found that a gate or two can be done away with; new field arrangement of placing of fences makes them superfluous. Where this can be done it results in a saving, as gates cost more than the section of fence they replace. Do away with gates wherever you can, then when you buy or build one see that it is good.

Questions and Answers

WHICH CLOVER YIELDS BEST?—Please tell me which kind of clover yields best, as I am interested in growing the very best possible yielders. I have both low land and hilly land on my farm, so perhaps two kinds would be most suitable.

R. R. N., Ohio.

A.—Without knowing positively the kinds of soil your farm consists of, it is hardly possible to state definitely which kind of clover will give you the biggest crop. As you no doubt know, alsike clover is best adapted to lower land where there is often an excess of moisture; medium red will do well on higher land, even if the soil is inclined to be sandy and is subject to summer drought. As to comparative yields, a recent experiment, just completed, by the Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station, and based upon tests ranging over a ten-year period in several parts of your state, may prove of value. The surprising thing in these results is that alsike heads the list even outyielding common sweet clover. The fact that figures are based upon a single cutting perhaps partly explains the failure of red clover to equal alsike yields, for it is well known that the second cutting of red clover is larger than that of others. Alsike yielded 2.64 tons per acre; white sweet clover yielded 2.60 tons; mammoth red yielded 2.29 tons; yellow sweet yielded 2.12 tons; and medium red yielded 2.02 tons. In the ten years covered by the tests, alsike headed the list 7 times and tied once; red clover won out two seasons. Alsike also showed far greater disease resistance than other clovers.

CONTROLLING PEACH TREE BORER.—Is there anything that I can use to keep the peach borers from getting into the trunks of my young peach trees? Large trees in this neighborhood have been almost ruined by borers, but so far mine have escaped.

A.—The following plan of protecting peach trees from borer atacks has been used successfully in South Carolina.

Lump lime	20 pounds.
Soap (whale oil, laundry soap, or homemade will do)	3 pounds.
Sulphur	4 pounds.
Water	20 gallons.

Shave the soap finely and dissolve in three gallons of hot water. Make a thin paste of the sulphur and add to the soap solution. Start lime slaking in a half-barrel. While it is slaking, pour the solution of soap and sulphur over it. When lime is completely slaked, dilute to take up to 25 gallons. This is enough to protect 200 to 300 trees, six to eight years old. This wash is very inexpensive as well as effective as a borer repellent, and is readily applied by using an old paint brush. Begin at the ground level and paint up to the first branches, then slightly hill up the earth around the base of the trunk. Painting branches is not necessary, as the adult moth which lays the eggs from which the borers develop always lays its eggs on the lower portion of the trunk.

Beautify Your Home With These Magnificent Ever-Blooming Roses!

THERE'S no place like home—and no home as beautiful in summer as when surrounded with fragrant, luxuriously blooming roses. Why not plant some around your home this spring? Even if you now have a garden, you can find room for the five splendid bushes offered here—and they will cost you nothing. We buy these roses from the largest rose growers in the world. They are the finest that can be obtained. There are five different varieties in the assortment and each is absolutely the prize of its class, producing every month in the season an amazing profusion of large, magnificent blossoms, delightful in fragrance and of the most radiant colors. The bushes are one year old, strong, healthy, with well-formed roots. No matter where you live you will receive them at the proper time to plant in your locality. We guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. If they do not, or if any of the bushes fail to grow, we will replace them free of all cost. Following is a brief description of each of the five varieties given you on this offer. And please remember that with the bushes we are also going to send you complete directions for their planting and culture.

You Get One Each Of These Five Prize Beauties!

Mrs. Charles Bell One of the most beautiful and fragrant shell-pink roses ever introduced. It is a strong, vigorous grower and one of the hardiest of all bloomers. The flowers are faultlessly formed, extra large and double, and the abundance of bloom produced in one season is simply astounding.

Etoile De Lyon This magnificent bright sulphur-yellow rose is a fine forcer and an ideal variety both for cutting and garden purposes, being an exceptionally vigorous grower and prolific bloomer, bearing its flowers on strong, erect stems well covered with dark, glossy foliage.

W. C. Gaunt A rose of unusual individuality. Its color is a brilliant, velvety vermillion tipped with scarlet. The buds are medium long and pointed, the stems rigid, habit branching, with large, oval beech-green foliage. The fragrance of this rose is like tea and it is a rapid, vigorous grower

Climbing Helen Gould There is probably no red rose so popular as the beautiful Helen Gould. It is now introduced for the first time in climbing form. Everybody is familiar with the warm watermelon-red color of its charming flowers. This is a grand climber, having none of the defects of the older varieties.

Snowflake A crowning masterpiece, with hardy, vigorous constitution, growing to perfection in almost any soil or situation. It has the most magnificent foliage and is a continuous bloomer of medium-size flowers, the beauty of which is nothing short of superb. Its color is pure white.

Our Free Offer For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you the above described five rose bushes (one each of the five varieties) free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8661. They will be mailed to you at the proper time for planting in your locality.

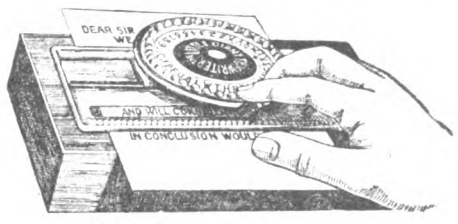
Here is a Bar Pin You'll Be Proud Of

Given for Two Subscriptions

Gift No. 1612

If this bar pin were made of platinum and set with genuine diamonds it could not be more beautiful in appearance than this exquisitely designed piece of jewelry. Six imitation flashing diamonds are mounted in solitaire settings and five more are set in the diamond-shaped design. The design is given just a touch of color by a delicate blue enamel. The pin is patterned after the most costly designs produced by the silversmith's art. It is finished in white which closely resembles the fabulously expensive platinum pins.

Wear a Lucky Sheik Ring They're All The Rage



Gift No. 1622

Given for Two Subscriptions

The ancient Egyptians were fond of wearing lucky charms and rings. Among the most frequently used charms was the entwined serpent as illustrated. The serpent was the emblem of power. The sheik's head is the emblem of love triumphant. The design of this ring combines those elements of luck and love which make it the favorite ring of the year. The head of the sheik in our ring is securely mounted on jade-green crystal which gives a colorful harmony to the design.

In every way this is a handsome ring which you will delight in wearing and which you will be proud to exhibit to your friends.

Our model can be had for only two subscriptions.

BE SURE TO SEND YOUR RING SIZE!

By using the above diagram you can tell exactly what size ring you wear if you will follow these directions: Put a stiff piece of paper around the second joint on your ring finger. Cut the paper off so that when drawn tight around your finger the ends exactly meet. Then lay the paper flat on the diagram, one end at the line O and the other end will indicate correct size. By following these instructions your ring will be a perfect fit.

Pair of Pearly Earrings

Given for TWO Subscriptions

Styles may come and styles may go but earrings are always popular and always worn.

If you could take this pair of eardrops in your hand you would marvel at the creamy luster of this exquisitely beautiful simulated jewel and wonder how it is possible to imitate so closely the wonders of the natural pearl. You would exclaim, too, over the delicacy of the finely wrought 10-K gold filled chain from which the pearl is suspended. Illustration is full size. For unpierced ears.

Everything Given To You

You can have any gift on this page if you will send us the required number of subscriptions. Look the gifts over, make your selection and then send us the number of yearly subscriptions called for at 50c a year. If a gift calls for only one subscription that subscription can not be your own. Your own subscription, though, counts one in any club of two or more. All gifts sent free and prepaid.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.
Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. A J., Wilbur, Oregon,—Deafness as a rule is due to a catarrhal condition of the nose and throat causing obstruction to the Eustachian tube. Head-noises are also as a rule caused by the same condition. Better consult some good ear-surgeon and be treated for your deafness.

Mrs. N. J., Ozark, Mo.—From your symptoms it would seem advisable to have the ovaries removed. Of course if this is done you will be sterile thereafter.

Mrs. V. G., Strafford, Mo.—Take your son to some Southern state, or have him examined by some good doctor who can or will find out if there is any toxin causing his asthmatic condition. In the meantime you can have him take a half-teaspoonful of pertussin after meals.

Mrs. W. B., Penn Run, Pa.—The only sure and safe way of removing superfluous hair is by use of the electric needle in competent hands.

Mrs. H. S. S., Spokane, Wash.—May be you have some kidneys trouble similiar to the liver trouble. Drink plenty of water and take after meals a five-grain tablet of urotropin. You might also have the bladder washed out two or three times a week.

Mrs. W. H. J., Orpha, Wyoming.—If the lump in the breast is attached to the overlying skin have it removed at once. The pain in the side is probably neuralgic. Take after meals a five-grain tablet of salicylate of sodium.

Mrs. I. S., Pelahatchie, Miss.—You are probably anemic and need a good tonic. Take after meals a tablespoonful of Basham's mixture well diluted.

Mrs. J. A. S., Hillsboro, N. C.—Take for the constipation two teaspoonfuls of fluid extract of cascara sagrada well diluted morning and night. The floating kidney should be re-attached by operation, or you should wear a supporting belt.

Mrs. T. F. B., Maysville, Okla.—You seem to have a malarial condition. Take after meals a teaspoonful of Warburg's mixture well diluted. For the vaginal discharge douche the vagina with a hot saline solution. Use about a teaspoonful of salt to the quart of hot water.

Mr. R. P., Gore, Pa.—Dyspepsia will cause a red-nose. Steam the nose and apply lotto alba at night.

Mrs. C H., Monticello, Ark.—Brain-fag probably. Take after meals a teaspoonful of Worburg's mixture, well diluted.

Miss L. A., Buffalo, S. D.—If your teeth are sound, and the gums in good condition, the trouble with your breath may be due to diseased tonsils. Try Dobell's solution as a mouth wash and gargle. Your head-ache is probably due to eye-strain. Have your eyes examined for correcting lenses.

Miss E. L., Blackfoot, Idaho.—Hemorrhoids are due, as a rule, to chronic constipation. In your case the only cure for you is to be found in a radical operation.

Miss H. B., Salem, Ill.—"Itching spots" under the arm are probably due to local infection. After cleansing the parts, apply Lasar's paste

Mrs. S. M. C., Baron, Okla.—The only remedy for your constipation, is fluid extract of cascara sagrada. Take two teaspoonfuls, if necessary, morning and night.

Mrs. M. E. C., Lonaconing, Md.—For your run-down condition, take two teaspoonfuls of Warburg's tincture after meals. For your constipation take two teaspoonfuls of cascara sagrada-fluid extract, morning and night.

Mrs. W. B. B., Shubert, Neb.—Cramps in the legs and feet may be due to the diabetic condition of patient. Have patient soak feet in a hot bath of Epson salts at night. Of course this presumes that the patient is on a proper diet and having the attention of a physician.

Mrs. O. S., Ricketts, Pa.—The brown spot on thigh is not malignant. Apply to the spot at night, Lasar's paste. Have your husband go to the hospital for an X-ray examination of his lungs.

Mrs. N C M., Spokane, Wash.—Pain in the breasts and fullness of same prior to menstruation is normal, and needs no treatment of any kind.

Mr. G. J. P., Berlington, Ind.—Warburg's tincture can be obtained at any drug store.

Mrs F. T., Rice, Va.—Have your sister take two teaspoonfuls of Warburg's tincture after meals. Her mental and physical condition may both be due to malaria.

Miss B. P., McCredie, Mo.—Just forget softening your flesh. Hard and sound flesh is very desirable and to be encouraged. I would continue to take the Nujol. For the gas, take after meals, one compound bicarbonate of soda tablet. Of course avoid sweets and pastries of all kinds. Your irregular periods will have no bearing on becoming pregnant after marriage. You should control your appetite and eat only three times a day; not between meals.

Mrs. E. J. M., Peculiar, Mo.—You were probably lacerated during confinement. You should be examined and, if the parts have been torn, have them restored to normal by operation.

Mrs. H. Y., Napolan, Mo.—Do not bother with your son's condition in any way. For yourself, you can take two teaspoonfuls of fluid extract cascara sagrada, morning and night. This remedy will not affect your nursing baby.

Mrs. J. F. P., Hinsdale, Mont.—Your son may be suffering from enlarged tonsils or adenoids. If so, an operation is indicated. May be also he needs circumcision

Mrs D M. W., Hamlet, N. C.—For the stomach indigestion take after meals one compound bicarbonate of soda tablet. For your chronic constipation take two teaspoonfuls of fluid extract of cascara sagrada at night well diluted.

Miss M C., Ransomville, N. Y.—Better have your eyes examined for glasses. Your entire stomach trouble may be due to eye-strain.

Mrs. M C M., Laclede, Idaho.—You should have the moles, both in your case and your daughter's removed by electricity.

Mrs O. B. C., Md.—If your husband is drinking excessively no treatment will be of any use in his case.

Mrs. S. W., Dixfield, Maine.—The cause of goiter is a tuxic condition of some form. Try ten drops of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium after meals, well diluted, and avoid meats of all kinds.

Miss B. E., East Jewett, N. Y.—Your irregular periods are due to your physical condition. Take a tablespoon of Basham's mixture well diluted after meals.

Mr. B. D., Browning, Mo.—You can have your druggist send your urine to any large city near you for report on condition. The pressure is due to your high blood pressure no doubt. The white spots are due to exudate in the retina of the eye. Irregularity of pupil may be normal for you.

Mrs. M. T.,—Gall stones are formed in the gall bladder. Have no direct connection with the pancreas. No relation to symptoms of pregnancy and disease of the pancreas.

Miss B. K., Macomb, Okla.—Your condition has no relation to cancer. Gargle the throat with Dobell's solution three or four times a day. Have your teeth looked after and see if the teeth are not causing some of your trouble.

Other Girls Had Dozens of Fellows—I Was a Wall Flower

My Cheeks Were Pale and Sallow, My Neck Scrawny, My Lips Colorless: Today I Am As Popular As Any of the Other Girls Because I Have Learned the Secret of Radiant Health and Beauty and Have a Well-Rounded Face and Figure.

Try making this slight change in YOUR MEALS for two weeks and watch for the astonishing results it so often gives.

For years I was so unattractive that I almost cried when I looked at myself in the mirror. Oh, how I envied other girls, whose dance cards were always filled and who were always popular and sought after by boys, who would not look at me twice. Just two weeks ago I read an article in the paper which told of a slight change in the daily diet which often changed women who had been thin, pale and unnattractive, in some cases even for years, so that they got back that magnetic charm of radiant health. This article stated that the most imporant element in building a strong, beautiful body full of grace and magnetism with sparkling eyes and rosy cheeks was a peculiar fom of iron found in the husks of grain and the peels and skins of certain fruits and vegetables. But modern methods of cooking throw these important things away so that probably 19 people out of 20 lack 100% in their blood. I tried mixing a little of iron this peculiar form of iron with my meals for two weeks. I feel and look years younger, with natural color in my lips and cheeks.

The above is a typical hypothetical case. It would seem that every woman whose attractiveness is impaired by lack of that magnetic charm that comes only with radiant health, would try adding a little of this newer form of iron to her daily food. It is comparatively inexpensive and may be obtained from your druggist under the name of Nuxated Iron, which should be mixed with your food as directed on each package. Amazing results are often secured in only two weeks' time. For sale by all druggists.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

de to those whose husbands are engaged in that work. That is why I was there. The exhibits were not so extensive last year as at other meetings. The purpose of these conventions is to broaden the minds of men engaged in this line of work, a kind of training school, with able instructors. The local hostess took care of the visiting ladies. A tea was given at the Ten Eyck Hotel at four o'clock, with about sixty-five present, music by orchestra, refreshments served.

We were taken through the New York Capitol building. B. A Pyrke of the State Dept. of Foods and Markets addressed the company. We visited the Educational Building and the Museum, the second largest in the world. Here I saw many odd things. I believe the Indians were looked upon with the greatest wonder, sheltered as they were beneath the leafy forest trees in their crude wigwams. A papoose strapped on the back of the squaw as she bent over her daily toil, a camp fire burning and a deer thrown over the shoulder of the old warrior. They looked as if they were thinking of their ill treatment by the white men.

A photograph of the company was taken on the steps of the Capitol Building.

The annual banquet was held Friday afternoon. Five hundred sat down at the chicken dinner, served in the basement of the Armory.

For some reason unknown to us, the weather man did not behave nicely for the sun did not smile on us during our visit. Returning home I saw that Jack Frost has almost finished his mischief and the beauty of the mountains had faded and had put on a pale grey appearance and the loveliest season of the year had gone.

EDITH NORRIS.

BOONVILLE, MISS.

DEAR COMFORT READERS:

Mary Jane, I think you did quite right not to make the affair publicly known as that would not have lessened the crime one bit. However, I think you made a mistake, when your husband suggested moving away, in not consenting. Being near and seeing this girl will help to keep the jealousy stirred in your heart. You say you believe your husband will make good if you can hold out to help him. If he is still willing to move away go with him where there are new interests. I am sure you will find it easier to forgive him and to help him. Pray God to direct you aright and help you to forget your trouble. I think you should make a confidant of this girl's mother and tell her all. The secret will be as safe with her as with you, and she will understand the coolness which you say she has noticed. And she may be able to help her daughter back to the right path. I think it wrong to keep the secret from her.

I am blessed with a good kind husband and three dear children, two boys and a girl. I realize the responsibility of rearing children. It is my earnest desire to bring up my little ones in the way they should go.

I raise Brown Leghorn chickens and sell eggs for spending money and never have to call on my husband for money. I buy most of our clothes with my egg money and have a bank account of my own besides.

Letters will be appreciated.

MRS. J. O MILLER.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Let me tell you how to prevent broken buttons. Take the buttons off the shirt front and in their place, make buttonholes. Then stitch the buttons to a broad piece of tape and slip them through the buttonholes. They may then be removed for washing and the one set of buttons will serve for several shirts, if the buttonholes are the same distance apart.

Before fastening a meat chopper onto the table, place a piece of sandpaper under both clamps, with the rough side next to the table. This will prevent it slipping.

When crocheting, keep a safety pin handy. Catch this in the stitch when you lay your work down and it will not ravel.

Nice, soft towels for baby's use can be made of two or three thicknesses of cheese-cloth. Cut the desired size, baste evenly together and stitch close to the edge; then work around over the stitching with double crochet or buttonhole stitch, using pink, blue or white thread. These towels do not irritate the tender skin of a baby. Wash-cloths to match can be made.

Add a little bluing to your dish-water and see how your glassware will sparkle.

Egg stains on silverware may be removed by rubbing with damp salt.

Mrs. Margaret Penncok, Livonia, Box 110, N. Y.

When making underwaists for children, take a pair of eyelets from the back of an old corset and sew on to fasten the hose supporters to, and save tearing the cloth.—Mrs. Carl Clark, Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

Soap that never fails. Five and one-half pounds of cracklings, three cans of lye and four quarts of water. Stir all together well, set on back of stove for three or four hours, stirring every little while. Remove and beat or stir hard to make it white, the more it is beaten the whiter will be the soap. Margaret Baldon, Bartlett, Neb.

Wear a Gold Pencil Around Your Neck

Reward No. 1532.

The height of style and utmost convenience are embodied in this new gold-filled self-sharpening pencil with its long neck ribbon.

Everyone who has used a self-sharpening pencil knows how convenient it is to have an ever sharp point with the simple turn of the barrel of the pencil. You have it in this attractive pencil and in addition you have a pencil that not only pushes out the lead but pulls it back, so it will not break. Our offer also includes a dozen extra leads in a handy little metal box.

Given for Two Subscriptions

The pencil itself is gold-filled and handsomely chased as shown in the illustration. The illustration is full size.

The ribbon, which is attached to the pencil with a firm snap catch, is 34 inches long, selvaged edges and of exceedingly good quality silk finish. The gold-filled ornament shown on the ribbon can be moved to any desired position.

If you searched through all the jewelry stores in the country you could hardly find a more attractive, stylish or convenient pencil than this.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this gold-filled pencil and neck ribbon with box of 12 extra leads all free and prepaid. Reward No. 1532.

Self-Pronouncing Bible

Illustrated with Colored Maps

Reward No. 8793

Given For A Club Of Three

SMALL enough to be carried conveniently in the hand or in pocket or hand bag, yet complete and unabridged containing full books of both the Old and New Testaments, is self-pronouncing and handsomely illustrated with colored maps showing different interesting portions of Palestine and surrounding country. It is 5½ inches long, 3¾ inches wide and one inch thick, beautifully bound in black leatherette and contains over a thousand pages finished with round corners and red edges. The name "Holy Bible" is stamped in gold on back and front cover. This is an unequalled opportunity for Sunday School workers, teachers, in fact all Bible students at home or in church to secure a Bible without cost and we feel that among COMFORT'S readers there must be thousands who have been waiting for us to make just such an offer as this. Remember that you are not going to receive a cheap, paper-bound book, but a splendidly made Bible, finely printed, handsomely and durably bound, and absolutely refined and perfect in every detail. We will send to any address this self-pronouncing Bible exactly as illustrated and described upon the terms of the following special Club Offer. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this Bible free by mail postpaid. Reward No. 8793.

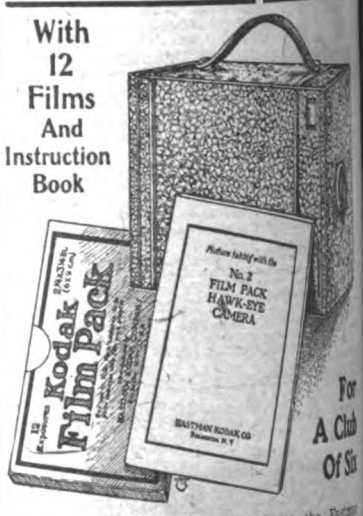
This Beautiful Crystal Necklace

Topaz Amethyst Emerald Sapphire

For A Club Of Only Two!

RIGHT from New York, the center of fashion, comes this new, stylish necklace and we were indeed fortunate in obtaining a good supply of them. We only wish we could show it in its actual colors because mere words fail to do it justice. It is thirty inches long, composed of brilliant crystal cut beads, alternating with seed beads, with transparent long oval and round bead ornamertations and tassel. It comes in four different colors—Topaz, Amethyst, Emerald and Sapphire.



City people of course have no difficulty in obtaining the newest styles in necklaces. But COMFORT'S women and girl readers live in the country, far from the up-to-date stores—and that's why we make this offer. This is your opportunity to secure a necklace as handsome and stylish as any that will be seen anywhere this season. And best of all, it will not cost you one cent if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this beautiful crystal bead necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Reward No. 1142.

Hawk-Eye Camera

With 12 Films And Instruction Book

For A Club Of Six

THE "Hawk-Eye" is made by the Eastman Kodak Co., so it is hardly necessary to tell you that it is a high-grade camera—one that you can depend upon to produce the most pleasing and satisfactory results. The "Hawk-Eye" takes a picture 2¼x3¼ inches, is fitted with a reliable quick action lens, automatic shutter adapted for either snapshots or time exposures and has two brilliant view finders so that pictures may be taken either the long way or short way of the camera. It uses a film pack containing twelve films. This film pack can be put in the camera and taken out in broad daylight, thus doing away with the necessity of going to a dark room every time you want to load it. We know that there must be thousands of COMFORT readers, old and young, who have been waiting for just this opportunity to secure a real good camera without paying a big price for it so we are prepared to give away thousands of these "Hawk-Eyes" as club rewards. And remember, we send you not only the camera itself but also one film pack containing twelve films and an instruction book telling you all about picture-taking from A to Z.

Given To You! For a club of only six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this new "Hawk-Eye" Camera with one Film Pack containing twelve films and complete Instruction Book free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 7985.

Preventing Warble Fly Attacks

MANY different preparations have been recommended for the purpose of keeping ox-warble flies from depositing their eggs on pasturing cattle and with the object of preventing grubs from forming in "boils" under the skin of the animal's back in late winter and spring. Perhaps a majority of farmers still believe that the fly deposits her eggs in the skin at the place where the grubs usually form and therefore apply repellents to the region of the loins. Scientists of the Bureau of Animal Industry, however, have shown that the eggs are deposited about the heels or below the knees and hocks and are then licked off by the animal. Then after penetrating the esophagus or gullet and migrating in the connective tissues the embryo larvæ eventually reach their favorite location along the backbone or at the loins and there develop into mature grubs. To keep the flies off, the Bureau investigators recommend, after thorough comparative tests of various preparations, a two per cent. solution of coal-tar creosote dip as most effective. They have found the wading tank method of application highly promising. The experiments made thus far indicate that cattle having their legs protected below the knees and hocks by the application of incesticidal or fly-repellent substances during the fly season have few if any grubs during the following winter. If further trial proves that the wading method is effective in controlling ox-warble infestation it is considered probable that suitable adaptations can be devised to meet practical requirements in treating range cattle. Meanwhile we wish to emphasize the importance of extraction and destruction of every mature grub by every owner of cattle and that can readily be handled, for by so doing the number of flies would be considerably reduced annually and in time the grub nuisance might be made far less prevalent.

Questions and Answers

DEATH OF SHEEP.—I have some sheep well and fat. About a week ago some of them refused to eat. They began to froth at the nose and shake their head and in a few days died. An examination after death, at the beginning of the small intestine I found it spotted with running sores, for about twelve inches, then scattered to the end.

MRS. B. B.

A.—You say little bunches or nodes characteristic of nodular disease of the intestines (vulgarly termed knotty guts), which are found present in thousands of fat sheep killed in the great abaitoirs of the cities during the winter season affected your sheep. There is no remedy for the disease which is the cystic stage of the life cycle of the worm known as Esophagotoma Columbanum. Your sheep probably were killed by self poisoning or auto-intoxication from constipation and disease of the liver caused by prolonged excessive feeding of coarse dry roughage and lack of exercise. Make sheep walk two or three miles every day to get clover or alfalfa hay scattered in a distant field. Also give each of them two pounds of roots or sound silage and feed oats and bran instead of corn.

SHRINK IN MILK.—My cow freshened three days ago, and gives about one glass of milk a day. She is four or five years old and before freshening she gave three quarts each day. If you will, please tell me what is the matter with her. J. M.

A.—Every dairy cow should be dried off, six weeks or more before calving otherwise she will, like the one in question, be likely to give little milk three times daily; massage the udder well each time and feed generously, or allow calf to nurse. It is unlikely, however, that the cow will give a profitable yield of milk before another freshening and it rarely pays to keep such a cow for that length of time. Better feed her for the butcher.

ROBBER COW.—One of my cows suckles one of the other cows when they are together. I have tried several things and so far all that has stopped it is a fence between. Mrs. J. S. G.

A.—Keep a straight bar bit in the cow's mouth or put a bull ring in her nose, hang one from that and if necessary a third ring from the second one. A spiked muzzle may serve the purpose but is liable to cause damage.

RICKETS.—I had a four-year-old sow that was hurt last summer, having two ribs broken. I put her in the pen January first. She fattened well, eating heartily until the middle of the month when she got down and couldn't walk. I killed her. I could break the bones like straw with my fingers. J. C. W.

A.—The sow robbed her own bones of mineral matter not being adequately and completely fed rations that would supply all of the necessary elements for perfect support of the body. In future make every hog take active outdoor exercise every day and feed clover or alfalfa hay, tankage and mixed meals rather than an exclusive ration of corn. Do not feed cottonseed meal and hulls to swine. Allow free access to salt, ground lime, stone and wood ashes or bone meal at all times. Allow growing pigs skim-milk.

COLIC.—My mare nine years old stays fat all the time. She has sick spells when she will stretch out as far as she can, then gallop a little ways and then lie down. Sometimes she will roll, but not every time. When standing she will roll her head around to the side and seems to be in pain. What should I do for her? E. E.

A.—At time of attack give the mare one pint of raw linseed oil containing one ounce of pure turpentine and one teaspoonful of fluid extract of nux vomica and a teaspoonful or two of tincture of ginger slowly and carefully as a drench from a bottle. Do not feed or water her when hot and tired or work her immediately after a meal. Feed from a big shallow box if she bolts her feed, add one-ninth part of wheat bran by weight to her oats. Carrots would be good for her.

BLACK TONGUE.—Can you send me a remedy for black tongue or sore mouth in dogs? I have lost four from this trouble. F. L. N.

A.—Feed dogs sound food at home and provide pure drinking water. Keep them from eating garbage or carrion, of any kind. If a case occurs give a teaspoonful of the following medicine every two hours until improvement occurs. Then every three or four hours; specific tincture of rhus toxicodendron, 15 drops; specific tincture of echinacia, one-half ounce; glycerine, one-half ounce add water to make four ounces; mix.

LAME MARE.—My mare, twelve years old is lame in her fore feet. When she gets up from lying down she can hardly stand. She will rest one foot, then the other. Can it be cured? MRS. H. F.

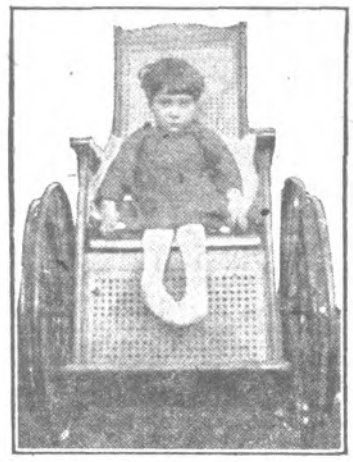
A.—The mare probably has been foundered. Some improvement may follow if you have her shod with flat thin-heeled wide-webbed bar shoes over dressing of sheep's wool fat (lanolin), oakum and leather pads and then blister the hoof-pads several times, one at a time with the following mixture. Biniodide of mercury, two drams, powdered cantharides, two drams, lard three ounces. Rub in for fifteen minutes and tie mare short. Wash blister off in forty-eight hours, then apply a little lard daily. Blister the second foot two or three days after washing the blister from the one first treated. Repeat the blistering at intervals of two or three weeks.

OBSTRUCTED TEAT.—I have a cow and one of her teats appears to have a small outlet for the milk. I can get only the smallest stream, no matter how hard I press. It hurts, causing her to kick. Is there any remedy? G. S. B.

A.—It would be best to have a veterinarian slit down through the stricture in four different directions with a teat bistoury and then strip away a little milk frequently during the healing process. If you cannot have that done try to enlarge the opening by several times daily inserting a lead probe of gradually increased size.

Five Wheel Chairs in April

684 is COMFORT'S Total to Date



The recipients of the five April wheel chairs are Adam Peterson, for his three sisters, Eva, Emma and Elsie, Declo, Idaho, 150; Miss Bessie Croft, Salem, Ark., 102; Mrs. F. E. Wise, Jewel Ridge, Va., 87; Hermon W. Staples, Ruleville, Miss., 83; Mariah Jefferson, R 1, Box 3, Woodlawn, Tenn., 45. The figures following their respective names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by these applicants or by their friends for them.

The entire list of 150 subscriptions for the Peterson chair came, all in one club, from O. C. Lott, a neighbor, from whose letter I will quote: "Please send a wheel chair to Adam Peterson, Declo, Idaho. The chair is for his three helpless sisters, Eva aged 40, Emma aged 36 and Elsie aged 25. These girls cannot walk without help. Their father and mother are dead. This brother, Adam, and a sister, about 28 years old, take care of them. These girls have been helpless for 15 years and have never had a wheel chair."

Miss Bessie Croft, age 27, is paralyzed from her knees down resulting from an attack of infantile paralysis when two years old. Of course she is unable to get about and is dependent on her father, mother and brother for care.

I have no information of Mrs. F. E. Wise, as Mrs. W. L. A. Kiser, who sent in the subscriptions, did not describe her friend's condition and circumstances.

Hermon W. Staples, age 12, lost the use of his legs about a year ago; they are weak and drawn up so that he can not walk or even stand. The cause of his disability is not known but the doctor suspects tuberculosis, as the boy's father died of that disease. This wheel chair will be a joy to the crippled, helpless lad, and a great help to his widowed mother in caring for him.

Moriah Jefferson is a little motherless girl who is crippled in her lower limbs so that she can not walk or stand. Her pastor, Rev. James Ransom, has been chiefly instrumental in obtaining the subscriptions for her wheel chair.

I thank you, my good friends, for helping me to make the April wheel chairs five, which is two more than the March number, and I hope you will boost the number up to seven for May.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT,
Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little easter each month than you do yours

Much Pleased with Her Comfort Wheel Chair

Ray, Ohio, Box 7.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

Enclosed you will find a photo of our little daughter, Mary Arleen Miller, in her COMFORT wheel chair with which we are much pleased. It gives her great pleasure as well as being a help. The night we received it she stayed up until ten o'clock, running it about the room; and then she had her wheel chair placed close to her bed so she could look at it, and the first thing in the morning she was in it again. We thank you and all who helped us to procure the chair.

Truly yours,
Mrs. George Miller.

Science's Discovery Routs Chicken Lice

Mineralized Water Gets Rid of Dusting or Spraying — Birds Delouse Themselves. Fine for Baby Chicks and All Poultry.

A recent discovery promises to revolutionize all the commonly accepted methods for keeping poultry free from lice and mites. This wonderful product keeps the poultry always lice-free without the poultry raiser doing any work. It is the simplest, easiest, surest and best method ever discovered.

Hick's Lice-Go, which is the name of this remarkable lice remedy, is dropped in the chickens drinking water. Taken into the system of the bird, it comes out through the oil glands of the skin and every louse or mite leaves the body. It is guaranteed to help the hatchability of the eggs and cannot injure the flavor of the eggs or meat; is harmless to chicks and does not affect the plumage. A few days treatment at the start and then a little added to the drinking water each month is all that is necessary.

Send No Money—just your name and address to Chas. M. Hick & Company, Dept. 311, 1018 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. A card will do. Mr. Hick is so confident that Hick's Lice-Go will get rid of every louse or mite that he will send you two large double strength $1.00 packages for the price of one. When they arrive, pay postman only $1.00 and postage. Sell one to your neighbor and get yours free. If you are not absolutely satisfied after 30 days trial, your money will be refunded. This offer is guaranteed by two big Chicago banks, who say that Mr. Hick will do exactly as he agrees without question or argument. Write today before this remarkable trial offer is withdrawn.

E. L.—The April issue of COMFORT will already have answered your questions.

A. B. J.—Possibly the birds have not had enough food. Hens must have animal and vegetable food during the winter, or they can't lay eggs. At this season of the year they will be able to find insects and green stuff for themselves if they are on free range, so conditions should improve. Next fall, start in early, cull your stock, and follow the instructions which you will find in this department during the fall months.

V. L. B.—In my February article I gave the prices as quoted in the New York paper for nearby strictly new laid eggs. I cannot furnish dealers' names. Personally, I have received from customers during November, December and January, $1.15 a dozen.

G. R. H.—The birds have what is known as black rot, a disease which authorities differ about very widely. Some say it is caused by a sudden chill, others say it is only the outward symptom of an intestinal desease. Treatment is rarely successful. You may save some of them by painting the comb twice a day with the following: To one ounce of water add one-half ounce of glycerine and two grains of carbolic acid crystals, also put one-half teaspoonful of muriate of ammonia in each pint of drinking water.

F. O. L.—The condition of the droppings may be caused by the fat and vinegar in the table scraps, or the introduction of the bran into their daily rations. Yes, it is quite usual to boil and use the infertile eggs for your young chicks.

F. T. B.—As a general thing, it is best not to use a rooster for breeding after he is five years of age, but sometimes, in the case of an especially good bird, he may be used for two or three years longer, if he is mated with not more than two or three hens. You can keep the same male bird with the same hens for years, or you can mate him with pullets of the same variety, but not related in any way. It is also perfectly safe to mate him with his own pullets, but not to the progeny of that mating, and you can use cockerals from the original old birds to mate back to the old hens without any fear of bad results from inbreeding.

F. I. H.—I advise you not to breed from hens which have been sick, especially as this is the second time they have been attacked in the same way, for I imagine from your description that they must come from roupy stock. Leghorns are just as healthy as any other variety of fowl. The birds of any variety that have been bred from stock that was sick would have a tendency to contract diseases.

O. C. B.—Unless you have a large incubator especially constructed for duck eggs, it is not very safe to try incubating goose eggs. They are too large for the egg chamber in an ordinary machine. However, if you want to try it, run your machine at the same temperature as you would for hens' eggs, but sprinkle the eggs with warm water every day, or keep a damp sponge in the machine.

A. P. S.—There is no difference between the White and Buff Leghorns except their plumage. I think you would find Wyandottes a better breed for small quarters as they stand confinement well.

E. E. F.—I should think from your description that the birds had very bad cases of canker. Your treatment was as good as anything I could have recommended.

Deaf Can Hear Says Science

New Invention Aids Thousands

Here's good news for all who suffer from deafness. The Dictograph Products Corporation announces the perfection of a remarkable device which has enabled thousands of deaf persons to hear as well as ever. The makers of this wonderful device say it is too much to expect you to believe this, so they are going to give you a chance to try it at home. They offer to send it by prepaid parcel post on a ten-day free trial. They do not send it C. O. D.—they require no deposit—there is no obligation.

They send it entirely at their own expense and risk. They are making this extraordinary offer well knowing that the magic of this little instrument will so amaze and delight the user that the chances of its being returned are very slight. Thousands have already accepted this offer and report most gratifying results. There's no longer any need that you should endure the mental and physical strain which comes from a constant effort to hear. Now you can mingle with your friends without that feeling of sensitiveness from which all deaf persons suffer. Now you can take your place in the social and business world to which your talents entitle you and from which your affliction has, in a measure, excluded you. Just send your name and address to The Dictograph Products Corporation, Suite 1302-L, 220 W. 42nd St., New York, for descriptive literature and request blank.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, OF COMFORT, PUBLISHED MONTHLY AT AUGUSTA, MAINE, FOR APRIL 1, 1923.

State of Maine,..... } ss.
County of Kennebec,... }

Before me, a Notary Public, in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared William H. Gannett, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Business Manager of the COMFORT and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management, etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are:

Publisher, W. H. Gannett, Publisher (inc.), Post-office address, 20 Willow St., Augusta, Maine.

Editor, A. M. Goddard, Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.

Managing Editor, William H. Gannett, Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.

Business Managers, W. H. Gannett, Bus. Mgr., Guy P. Gannett, Assist. Bus. Mgr., Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.

2. That the owners are: (Give names and addresses of individual owners, or if a corporation, give its name and the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of the total amount of stock.) Owner: W. H. Gannett Publisher (incorporated), 20 Willow St., Augusta, Maine.—Stockholders: Gannett Publishing Co. (incorporated), Augusta, Maine, William H. Gannett, Guy P. Gannett, Horace Colburn, all of Augusta, Maine, and Post Office address of all, Augusta, Maine.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) No outstanding bonds, mortgages or other securities.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona-fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

WILLIAM H. GANNETT,
Business Manager.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

Mrs. E. J., Georgia.—No; the old Waverly magazine is no longer published. We agree with your mother that it used to print some good stories. We remember them well, also. (2) Mrs. Margaret Sanger may be addressed at 104 Fifth avenue, New York City. This is the office of the Birth Control Review of which Mrs. Sanger is editor.

F. W., Ithaca, N. Y.—As to the existence of life upon Mars, Venus, and other planets, we think the majority of modern scientific opinion rather favors the possibility of such life existing. However, you must remember that this life need not be the same as our own or reaching the form of man. Conditions upon Venus are thought to be distinctly favorable for animate life, as the atmosphere of the planet is much like that of our earth. As science chooses to consider that living organisms develop over a sufficient interval of time where conditions are favorable, it thus believes that it is highly probable that Venus, and possibly Mars, bear animate life today in some form. However, the small size of Mars and its distance from the sun handicap the planet compared to Venus in the question of life-possibilities. Too, it is thought probable that among the thousands of millions of stars there may exist in such a great cosmic sowing other planets here and there which might conform to the requirements for the development of animal life. And it is interesting to consider that there are chances for some of these unknown life phenomena to exceed in complexity and quality such as have developed upon our earth. In its simplest form, it can be said in answer to your inquiry, that the matter of habitable planets is mainly a question of the existence of water in liquid form and sufficient quantity. This is the prime necessity for the formation of such life as our own world holds. Neither the day nor the night of a planet must be so long that the existence of liquid water is prevented. When these conditions exist, science considers that life cannot also exist. Some water is thought to be upon Mars, but in the opinion of today's science it would be insufficient in amount to account for the existence of so highly developed a being as man—even in the stage of development said man had reached up to August, 1914.

N. H., Williamsville, Mo.—There are two common causes why a house plant such as your fern does not grow well: first, it may be root-bound, that is the pot is too small for the root growth; and second, there may be worms of some sort feeding upon the roots. In any event, we advise that you remove your fern from the pot and carefully crumble away the earth from its roots, noting if any worms exist and, if so, removing them. Then re-pot the fern, using new earth and a larger pot, if the last seems necessary. What florists call leaf-mould, which you can obtain from the top soil in deep, moist woodlands, is the best sort of earth for the purpose of re-potting your fern. Be sure and sift your new earth carefully to prevent any worms remaining. See that you have a few pebbles or bits of broken china in the bottom of the pot to establish proper drainage. An occasional sprinkling of bone meal is a good fertilizer for any house plant. Water regularly, but not too much at a time, and be sure that the fern receives sufficient, but not too strong, sunlight, and not too violent changes in temperature during the cold months.

Z. M. V., Greentown, Pa.—When you ask "Is a dog intelligent or educated?" we believe you mean us to tell you if the almost human traits some dogs display are the result of instinct, reason, or training. As is usually the case, we find scientists going two ways on this question of how much, if any, a dog reasons. John Burroughs, the famous naturalist, was up to the time of his death a firm upholder in print of the theory that all actions of animals might be attributed to instinct. Other natural observers have as strongly taken the other side. Through his long association with man the dog has become the most intelligent of animals, and this inherited intelligence can be largely increased by education in particular cases. It is undoubtedly the case that dogs coming from a line of kennel-bred ancestry are far less intelligent than those dogs whose parents for several generations back have been family pets. We think any one who has ever owned a dog will know this. Personally we are on the side of those who grant to the dog considerable brain power. A dog will plainly show sorrow and joy. He will dream. He will carry remembrances over long periods and will often show what appears to be a good quality of reasoning in overcoming difficulties. Our own experience has been that there is hardly any limit to the amount of words and conversation an intelligent dog can be taught to understand. Of course some dogs have less intelligence and act more from animal instincts than do others of their race. And this is so with their masters. A dog could never have become such a companion for human beings if he had not in his make-up many and most of human traits. But he still manifests some of the mean and vile traits of his wolf ancestors.

Mrs. A. M. W., Texas.—Joseph Guarnerius was a member of a noted family of violin makers of Cremona, Italy. Joseph was a nephew of Andres Guarnerius who had learned his art from Nicola Amati in 1650-65. Nephew Joseph became the most famous member of this family of craftsmen, and was for a time a pupil of the great Stradivarius. Experts regard the work of Joseph Guarnerius as varying greatly—the instruments made during his last years being for some reason far inferior to those of his middle life. He was born in 1687 and died in 1745. Most of the violins authenticatedly his work are now in the hands of collectors or in museum cases. We cannot tell you if he worked at his craft during the time he was a prisoner but we doubt if this was so. It does not seem likely that he could have had at his disposal the tools and other materials needed for his craft.

M. B. M., Flatonia, Tex.—A thermometer is an instrument whose degrees were arbitrarily fixed by man. Zero on the centigrade scale is the temperature of melting ice, while on the scale originated by Gabriel Fahrenheit he placed his zero point 32 degrees lower. Both centigrade and Fahrenheit thermometers are divided into degrees according to the variation between the freezing point of water and the point at which the same liquid boils. On a centigrade thermometer there are 100 degrees between its zero (the freezing point) and the point at which water boils. On a Fahrenheit thermometer this distance has been divided into 180 degrees, and the space between its zero (32 degrees between freezing) and the 212 boiling point of water scales 212 degrees. As you doubtless know, it is the Fahrenheit scale which is used on the ordinary household instruments that tell us when it is too cold to put the cat out.

Comfort's League of Cousins

I like your good, sane, normal young reaction against too much perfume, Marion. It's bad when it becomes a smell and not the faint fragrance it is properly meant to be. There's a lot of difference! But as for your cashier objection, Marion, I really believe I had just as soon accept a ten dollar bill that fairly reeked of lilac, as I would to pocket a five spot that had only a nice clean Treasury smell to its credit. How about it?

You're a perfect young Daniel in your judgment on the young people question, Marion, and if our boys and girls are wrong, it's because somebody older than they are were wrong first. A generation is the resulting product of tendencies set going in the previous one, or takes its cue from conditions sponsored perhaps by the very older critics who sit in judgment. You quote Scripture, Marion, and I'll suggest, too, that when the parents have eaten sour grapes it is a pretty safe thing that the children's teeth are going to be on edge. But I think that your teeth are O. K., Marion, and that when you do bite, you take hold with a sure grip of hard young sense. I'm for you and your kind strong. Welcome to Our Bunch!

KEYSTONE IOWA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I am so interested in the League of Cousins I thought I, too, must write. Oh, that trip through the Oregon caves and never being asked for fare, and a voyage to Australia also. I do wish Cousin Marjorie would write us from Australia and tell about her birds there.

My study is entomology and I wish I may hear from some of the "bug students" in the South. I wish to get the Zebra and Tiger butterflies. I have a lovely collection in my dining-room. I'll do what I can in return. I embroider and paint from some of these beauties. I raised some moths last year.

I love animal painting too. Dogs especially, also sceneries. It is this that always brings my Christmas money. I also painted stationery with initials in gold and water colors.

I was much interested in the letter of "A Mother in Need," in the Sisters' Corner of the November COMFORT. I wish that she would write me and I might be able to help.

Your niece,
MRS. HUGO THEISSEN.

I'm glad you like us, Mrs. Theissen, and I hope you get your wished-for Zebra and Tiger butterflies for your Bug Zoo. The Elephant and Rhinoceros butterflies are also delightful specimens, although they are rather heavy to mount in the ordinary collection. Even a twenty-penny nail is rather light for the job.

It is lots of fun to raise moths, isn't it? And really not so much trouble if you start right. I usually raise quite a large quantity myself each year, Mrs. Theissen, so you see I speak from experience. I have found it quite profitable to sell them in the raw state to a moth ball factory at Greenpoint. Any old overcoat, the thicker the better, will do to commence operations on a small scale, although many successful moth raisers state that only new garments should be used if the largest crops are looked for. Place a few crumbs of pound cake (the twelve egg sort, frosted or unfrosted) in each pocket of the coat and sprinkle well with a solution made from one tablespoonful of molasses dissolved in a cup of warm water. The coat should then be hung in a warm dark closet and left absolutely undisturbed for six months before any attempt is made to harvest the moths. Several overcoats, and even expensive wool blankets, can be started at one time, if a large number of moths are desired to be raised. I have found that ten pounds of adult moths can be relied upon to make four pounds of moth balls. There is, of course, a large waste in rolling and in evaporation.

Buffalo bugs are also easily cultivated, although these bugs do not grow well in all portions of the country. Old carpets make a good soil for these interesting creatures. In these times when the real buffalo is almost extinct, a few buffalo bugs should be raised by every family. I heard of a woman in Texas who raised enough of the tame and useful fur-bearing insects to make a robe for her automobile.

The painting of animals is a valuable use of art, Mrs. Theissen, and I'm glad you do a lot of it. There is altogether too much sameness in the landscaping of our barnyards and pastures, and a little paint applied with taste is a great help toward scenic beauty. A few old conservative farmers might object to red and green horses and refuse to let you apply the first coat to their teams, but as we have red and green automobiles there should be no logical objection. I think green horses would go best with a red lumber wagon, and vice versa. And there is a great field for your work among domestic pets. These everlasting yellow cats, for instance, of which there are so many—these could be decorated in a variety of pastel shades, and a litter of brown puppies could be painted in interesting ways that would delight any fond mother. A pale blue puppy, with a pink bow tied below his left ear, would be perfectly delightful. The tails could all be done in contrasting colors, if preferred, and if you can make them stop wagging long enough to apply the color. Possibly they might be stapled to a board until thoroughly dry. I am enthusiastic about your work of painting the animals of Iowa, Mrs. Theissen, and I hope you will keep your brush busy.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for May

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done in unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Chicken Lice Vanish In Twenty-Four Hours

Science Finds That Mineralized Water Banishes Vermin, Makes Fowls Grow, Lay More Eggs and Improves Health of Flock.

Lice, chiggers, fleas, mites, etc., probably rob one-third to one-half of the poultry raiser's profits by sucking the very life blood from the flock. But there is no longer any reason why you should suffer this loss since the perfection of a remarkable new mineral formula by science.

Not only does this wonderful method do away with the bother and trouble of greasing, dusting and spraying, but it practically assures doubling your profits, because you get more eggs and faster broilers.

With this simple, scientific system, you merely drop a few mineral tablets in the fowls' drinking water. The tablets quickly dissolve and within a day or two after the fowls drink the water the lice, fleas, etc., leave for good. For instance, J. H. Veach, of Logansport, La., writes "The lice left my flock like a swarm of gnats on a hot try morning."

This wonderful mineral compound simply puts elements into the fowl's blood which the lice cannot stand, yet is warranted not to harm the eggs or meat in any way.

Over 150,000 poultry raisers have used the formula known as Paratabs with great success. Many say they would not think of doing without it.

If you would like to try it, you can do so on the understanding that it will not cost you a penny if it does not rout your lice, and make your poultry healthier and more profitable in every way.

Simply address a post card or letter to W. J. Smith, 3709 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo. Don't send any money at all. Mr. Smith will immediately send you two large $1.00 packages (enough for a season) at a special introductory price of only $1.00. Pay the postman only $1.00 and postage. You can easily sell one package to a friend and thus get yours free. Try Paratabs 10 days. If the lice are not all gone, your hens laying more eggs, and strutting around full of life and pep—if for any reason you are not satisfied, simply say so and your money will be returned.

This is a special introductory offer good for only a short time and should be accepted at once as a big bank says Mr. Smith does as he agrees, furthermore, your money is fully protected by ample bank deposits.

Mrs. L. P. Jennings, Gage, Okla. Here is an aid asked by Mrs. Jennings that her little girl of eight years can have an operation for contracted so that she may see again. Glasses are everything be finer than to grant this child sight. Money could do nothing better. Mrs. Neal Deal, R. 5, Stuart, Va. An aged and crippled woman looking for aid to make her days easier. Mrs. Mary Curry, Spencer, Va. The widowed mother of four children whose ages range from eight to twelve. Mrs. Curry needs clothing and cash. She makes a good light and deserves help. Mrs. Walter Pendleton, Hamlet, N. C. This young wife has a husband in the hospital for a second serious operation, while she is left with a two-year-old child and a number of debts. If she is helped through this, brighter days may come. Carry her through the trouble. George Miller, 466 8th St., Benton Harbor, Mich. Here is a man who can help know what it is to lie straight in bed. He has been crippled for ten years and cannot care for himself in any way. He asks for cheer letters and postcards. He is particularly fond of poetry. Laura Jones, Cambria, Va. A cripple and with no means of support, this worthy woman is forced to ask for financial aid. Was recommended. Miss Carrie Hall, Stroud, N. C. Asks for clothing, cheering reading matter, and any financial aid that can be given. A deserving cripple and help given will count here. Mrs. R. M. Saenz, Clear Creek, N. Mex. A widow with three small children, one five, one seven, and the youngest but six months. Clothing will greatly aid this struggling family. Also quilt pieces and a baby's crib.

Spring is here once more. The skies are blue, the sun is warm, and the grass is green. Yet there remain shadowed homes, dark rooms, shut-in and pain-racked bodies, and hungry children lacking food and clothing. You who are happy, who can lead active lives of labor and love, help these sufferers who are shut away from aiding themselves. The helpless need must come to them. They cannot seek it themselves.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers. It costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. C." on it, a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, and after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted to COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year. If you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members is undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people in the world.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Hint to Housewives Who Cook with Gas

w housewives are aware that violent ing does not accelerate the speed of king, but only evaporates the water needlessly with an equivalent waste of gas.

Tests made by the Bureau of Standards, Washington, D. C., have established a number of important facts that housewives can do well to remember:

1. Violent boiling, with the lid on the utensil, gas on full, consumes about nine times more gas than is necessary to maintain gentle boiling.

2. For gentle boiling, about five times as much gas is used with the lid off as would be required if the lid were on the utensil.

3. When violently boiled, water evaporates at about the same rate with the lid on as with the lid off.

Postal Savings Deposits

There are fourteen cities having postal savings deposits of more than $100,000. The Post Office Department names them as follows: Sioux City, Iowa; Tonopah, Nevada; Chester, Pa.; Hurley, Wis.; East Pittsburgh, Pa.; Augusta, Ga.; Raymond, Washington; Fall River, Mass.; Boise, Idaho; Norwich, Conn.; Export, Pa.; Miami, Fla.; Masontown, Pa.; Barre, Vt.

The National Parks

A total of 1,216,490 persons were reported visitors to the national parks and monuments during the past year, an increase of 44,493 persons over the record travel of last year. Last year's total shows an increase of 881,691 persons more than there were recorded in the parks seven years ago in 1915.

Stock-Raising Homestead Lands

The U. S. General Land Office passed entries which amount to 7,070,175 acres under the stock-raising homestead act, during the past year. The area patented during the year was 12,904,821 acres, being a very substantial increase over the previous year.

Fires in the National Forest

Nearly 6,000 forest fires were started in the national forests of the country during 1921, is the statement of Chief Forester William B. Greeley in his annual report of the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture. One-fourth of these fires are caused by lightning and one-third directly attributable to the carelessness of campers.

Driven to It

Although John and his wife had been married thirty years, it was said about town that they had never been known to agree upon anything—exept once. John bought a car, and in due course learned to run it—in a way. So he invited Mrs. John for her first ride. All went merrily for exactly two city blocks, when John decided to turn a corner.

"John!" screamed his wife, grasping his arm, "You're going to hit that pole!"

"I know it," said John. And he did.

Famous Kroehler BED-Davenport

Winner of the Gold Medal

The above is a facsimile of the Gold Medal awarded the Famous Kroehler Bed Davenport at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in 1915. The Kroehler is acknowledged supreme for comfort, for convenience, for construction. If you are to have a Bed Davenport in your home, don't be satisfied with anything less than the best—the Kroehler, with all its special features and extra conveniences.

$1.00 Down

Madam, this is one of the most sensational offers ever made by Straus & Schram. Read every word of this offer.

You've always wished for a bed-davenport: for the beauty, convenience and extra sleeping capacity it brings. And now we bring you the opportunity to own the famous Kroehler bed-davenport (known and acknowledged the best of all bed-davenports) on a perfectly amazing, price-smashing offer. Look at the illustration. It gives only a small idea of what a handsome, massive and comfortable piece of furniture it is. But you don't have to imagine how it would look in your home; on this special offer we'll send it right to your house on approval upon receipt of the coupon with only $1.00 deposit!

Think what this bed-davenport will mean to your home. A luxurious divan by day which will enrich the appearance of your room. And at night, a full size bed—extra sleeping capacity for some one who is crowded now or when company drops in for a stay. Indeed, no home is complete without a Kroehler bed-davenport.

A Luxurious Divan by Day—A Full Size Bed at Night!

The large illustration shows the Bed-Davenport closed. Just see that heavily padded, luxurious upholstery. Note the massive construction, the elegant Colonial design. What a decoration to your home.

And at Night, opened up into a full size bed as shown in the small illustration. And this is no "good enough" bed. It's as comfortable and as restful as any bed you ever slept on. The bed frame and spring are entirely independent of the upholstering in the Kroehler. You sleep on a regular spring, not on the upholstering as in old fashioned davenports.

Finish Made of selected solid oak, finished in a deep rich gloss golden or a dull waxed brown fumed. It is also made of selected birch, in beautiful mahogany finish. The finish is applied to last. You will be proud of its appearance for years to come.

Construction The seat has eighteen 6½ inch oil tempered wire coil springs, supported on steel crossbars. Crimp wire bound to prevent sagging, with heavy duck canvas over springs. Filling is of fine fibre and cotton top. The metal bed frame and folding mechanism are made of all steel Easy to operate. A child can open and close it. Has wardrobe back into which all bedding folds when the davenport is closed.

Luxurious Upholstering The plain, dust-proof seat and back are thickly padded and luxuriously upholstered in brown Delavan leather, the best imitation of Spanish leather known.

Choice of fumed oak, golden oak or mahogany finish. Measures 59½ inches wide. Height of back from seat, 20 inches; depth of seat, 20 inches. Size of bed when open, 72 x 48 inches. Shipped from factory near Chicago or New York factory. Shipping weight about 240 lbs. Shipped knocked down to save considerable on freight charges; easily set up.

Order by No. B7481A. Send only $1.00 with the coupon, $4.50 a month. Total price, $47.90.

30 Days Trial

Don't make up your mind now. Just send the coupon below and we'll ship this Kroehler bed-davenport to your home on 30 days' trial. Use it freely for 30 days see what a luxurious piece of furniture it is, how it makes the whole home look more complete, more inviting See what a roomy, comfortable divan it makes by day. Open it up and use it as a bed for thirty nights. Judge if you ever slept on a more comfortable, restful bed. Think what a convenience it will be every day and night of the year—just like adding another room to your house! Then compare the price with what you would have to pay spot cash locally. If, after the 30 days, you feel that you can possibly get along without this bed-davenport, if you don't agree that it is a perfectly sensational bargain offered on most liberal terms, send it back at our expense and we'll refund your money plus any freight charges you paid.

$4.50 a Month

If you decide to keep this Kroehler bed-davenport, you may own it on the most surprisingly easy terms. Pay only $4.50 a month until you have paid only $47.90 in all—a rock-bottom smashed price. Can you match this price for spot cash anywhere? And we give almost a year to pay. What could you spend $4.50 a month for that would give you more real, lasting, worth while satisfaction than for this famous Kroehler bed-davenport? Would movies, candy, cigars, and knick knacks mean so much to you? You know that every family spends more than they should for such things and when the year is over they have nothing to show for it. Decide now to save those nickels and dimes for something worth while. Send for this bed-davenport now. We trust honest people anywhere in the U. S. No discount for cash, nothing extra for credit. No C. O. D.

Price Slashed Send NOW

Madam, take our advice and don't let this opportunity slip by. Never have you been offered such a price-smashing value and on such liberal terms. We have only a limited number of these Kroehler bed-davenports and we can't guarantee how long this lot will last—so send for yours today. Just $1.00 with the coupon brings it on thirty days trial—think of it! Satisfaction guaranteed or your $1.00 plus all freight charges refunded. Don't miss this opportunity—send the coupon now!

High and Rising Cost of Crime—Rogues Got away with More than Three Billions of Loot Last Year

DESPITE the extension of organized uplift work, for the support and promotion of which so many millions of dollars have been expended during the past decade, there has been an alarming increase of crime grossly out of proportion to the gain in population in this country in the same period. By 1918 it had attained a magnitude and prevalence that attracted public attention as a menace that required drastic treatment. At that time it was called a "wave of crime," and was generally attributed to the demoralization due to war. Had this diagnosis been correct the crest of the wave should have broken and begun to recede ere now, as the war ended more than four and a half years ago. It was not a wave caused by war's social upheaval, but a current previously set in motion by other, deeper causes and was already running strong when the occurrence of war merely gave it additional impetus. Rolling on in an ever rising flood it has submerged the cities in a reign of terror and is spreading with deleterious consequences into the rural sections. This growth of lawlessness, although manifest in all species of offenses, has developed mostly in those classes of crimes the commission of which is induced by avaricious motives.

According to conservative estimates based on reliable information the great army of burglars, highwaymen train robbers, thieves, forgers, embezzlers, swindlers and other crooks, by their nefarious operations in the United States in the year 1922 gathered in and safely got away with plunder to the value of at least three and one-third billion and probably as much as four billion dollars. This is a gigantic business that the crime guild does; its enormous annual revenue extorted from the people by force and fraud is a heavy tax on the honest industry and thrift of the nation; and some idea of how heavy it is may be gathered from the fact that it about equals the total annual revenues of the U. S. Government derived from all sources of taxation.

The police departments of the larger cities keep a fairly complete and accurate record of crimes within their precincts reported for official investigation. In 28 cities, with only one-seventh of the country's population, 37,554 automobiles were stolen in 1921. The police record of New York City for 1921 shows 41,056 crimes committed against property reported, of which 1,175 were embezzlements, 1,197 robberies, 6,558 burglaries, 320 forgeries, 30,900 thefts including 6,808 automobiles stolen. The jewelers of that city lost more than a million dollars in 1922 by burglaries and robberies, many of which were committed audaciously during business hours in the daytime. The representative of a large marine insurance agency says that the booty gathered by pirates in New York harbor and docks amounts to fifty million dollars a year and probably half as much in other seaports of the country Last year the railroads paid more than twelve million dollars in settlement of claims for freight stolen in transit. In the thirteen months between April 1, 1920 and May 1, 1921, ten mail train holdups and twenty mail truck robberies yielded the robbers more than three million in cash and securities that were being transported as registered mail.

Boldness to an astonishing degree is a characteristic feature of these robberies and burglaries which in many cases have been accomplished by murdering the guard, clerk or owner in charge of the money or goods at the time of the theft—such trifling regard have present-day criminals for human life that stands in their way! Passing now to the class of offenders who employ fraudulent instead of forcible means in the unlawful acquisition of cash, goods, securities or lands belonging to others, we find a host of artful swindlers using every imaginable device and scheme to induce the credulous or unwary to part with their valuables for a share in an alluring get-rich-quick proposition that promises enormous profits. The President of the New York Stock Exchange, who devotes his best energies to preventing not only worthless but even suspected stock from being listed on the "board" and dealt in through the Exchange, estimates the fraudulent stock loss in New York City at a hundred millions a year.

The figures that we have cited for certain large cities were extracted from official records and reports that presumably are reliable. While exact accuracy is not claimed for the figures given for the entire country they are believed to be conservative and well within the bounds of actuality, for although in part the result of estimate where definite data were not obtainable the calculation was made by experts familiar with the problems involved and having at their command the experience and statistics gathered by the insurance companies. Property losses through crime have grown to such proportions that within the last few years insurance against burglary and theft has become an important line of business. Many commercial and manufacturing concerns have found it prudent to carry this class of insurance and, of course, include the cost thereof in the cost of production which the consumer has to pay. Many carry burglary insurance on jewelry and other valuables in their homes, and it is a common practice among automobile owners to insure their cars against theft. The premium rates for such insurance are based on the risk; with regard to automobiles the risk of theft is large with small chance of recovery, and the insurance rate is correspondingly high.

Few if any communities are free from vicious and criminally inclined persons, but the crime centers are in the cities which are infested with professional criminals who make their living principally or exclusively by criminal practices, operating mostly in the larger places but frequently extending their depredations into the small towns and even to the farms and country byways. Most of the robberies, burglaries, thefts and swindles are contrived and perpetrated by these professionals who are not only known as such to the police but are pictured in the rogues' galleries and duly classified according to the species of crime in which they specialize, and as a rule they have court or prison records. Why, then, are these human wolves allowed to go at large and prey on the innocent?

It is the assiduous propaganda of misguided philanthropists who cherish an unwarrantable and sickly commiseration for evil-doers that has softened the penalties and crippled the administration of our criminal statutes to a degree that has transformed the United States into a happy hunting-ground for the lawless. The courts experience increased difficulty in procuring conviction of the guilty, judges are adversely criticised if they impose sentences of adequate severity, and governors are too prone to pardon offenders or to mitigate the penalties imposed by the courts, and the probation officers and parol boards (all recent creations for easing the path of the trangressor) are overactive in obtaining suspension of sentence or diminution of penalty. The situation is aptly epitomized in the remark of the Wall Street Journal that "there was less crime when it was the practice to suspend the criminal instead of suspending sentence."

Were it not a matter of such serious consequence it would seem a ghastly joke for thousands of known habitual criminals to be plying their noxious trades in defiance of law and decency and to the terror of the community. In some localities the deluge of crime has become so menacing as to cause a revulsion of public opinion in favor of sterner and more effective measures for suppression, notably in New York City where the police force, largely augmented for the purpose, is making a vigorous effort to round up the criminals, and the courts and district attorney are assisting in the attempted clean-up by speeding up trials of the accused and imposing stiff prison sentences on the convicts. The general situation demands similar administrative action throughout the country, also legislation to put a wholesome fear of the law into all who are criminally inclined by authorizing more severe penalties for all offenders and requiring long sentences for habitual criminals. In due consideration of the rights and interests of the community the safest best place for the habitual criminal is in prison.

Housewives Fight Sugar Speculators with Consumers' Boycott

THE country is facing a repetition of speculative cornering of sugar such as raised the price of that commodity to unprecedented heights in the spring and summer of 1920. Then, as now, a world shortage of sugar was asserted, currently reported and generally believed, and speculators took advantage of the situation as an opportunity to extort unconscionable profits from consumers by buying the available stocks of sugar in this country and Cuba, which is our chief source of supply, and raising the price regardless of every consideration except their insatiable greed. Our people easily fell victims to these robbers and unwittingly aided in the consummation of the wicked scheme, for in their panicky efforts to provide against the threatened sugar famine they bought heavily and hoarded as the price rose, even following it up to thirty cents a pound. But the speculators overplayed their hand by raising the price to a figure that attracted large shipments from remote regions, so that by mid-summer the market showed signs of being glutted and sugar from South America and the East Indies was underselling the speculators in the United States; their corner was broken, their control of the American market ended; it suddenly developed that instead of the supposed scarcity there was a surplus of sugar in the country, and thenceforth through the ensuing months of that year and the next the price dropped rapidly at first and then gradually until it nearly reached the pre-war level. Many of the speculators who were holding on for higher prices were caught overstocked with high-cost sugar when the slump came and were ruined financially by the collapse of their own device. This result which actual and threatened criminal prosecution by the Government had failed to accomplish, came about automatically through the action of the natural law of supply and demand.

When it became known last February that the recently harvested Cuban sugar crop was considerably smaller than the island's average production in latter years, the prediction of another world sugar-shortage was industriously circulated by speculators who were again trying to control the sugar market and have since boosted the price outrageously. The Tariff Commissioners' special report to the President in effect attributes the present exorbitant price of sugar to pernicious speculation, and the Federal Government has initiated and is prosecuting such action as is authorized by law to punish and restrain the offenders, but with little or no effect, as was the case in 1920, for the sugar gamblers are defiantly persistent and appear determined to profiteer to the extent of their ability. Enlightened by their experience in 1920 the people, and especially the women, in various parts of the country have started a movement for a general boycott to reduce, so far as possible, the purchase and consumption of sugar, and particularly to discourage hoarding, as the most effective means of bringing the speculators to their knees and forcing a substantial reduction in price. This movement is heartily approved and supported by prominent Federal, State and city officials and leading citizens in the belief that, if made a nation-wide uprising, it will speedily accomplish the desired purpose. Eugene C. Hultman, Chairman of the Massachusetts Commission on Necessaries of Life, enthusiastically indorses the consumers' boycott and points out that, as seventy per cent. of the sugar consumed in the country is used in the homes, the housewives hold the key to the situation.

)ale's Commencement Gown

By Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

See front cover illustration.

A GROUP of girls was gathered in Melita Grandin's room in the dormitory. Where there are women, there is talk that eventually will turn to the subject of dress.

t had already reached that stage at this conation, and the girls were deep in the dision of the gowns they were to wear on aduation Day, only two days away.

'Since your cousin, Milton, is to attend the rcises, I shall put on the dog!" exclaimed nnie Preston. "Are you sure, Melita, that s your first cousin? There's no danger of ı having been adopted in his babyhood or thing like that to lessen our chances with ı? He's certainly the most loverlike cousin en he's with you!"

'He is irrevocably my first cousin, so go to girls, and may the best dressed win!" laughed lita. "Though I don't know that he looks that exclusively, Winnie. He likes a cerı amount of intelligence."

A concerted shriek greeted this, for Winifred ston had graduated "by the skin of her th." as the vulgar saying is. But Winnie ays admitted her deficiency with perfect od humor, and making a wry face, she eximed:

'In such case, we mught just as well pass honors to Dale!"

'As if he'd care anything for a confirmed ool ma'am!" exclaimed Dale Treadwell. , indeed, girls, count me out on that. I ll make myself as inconspicuous as possible en we all blossom out of the chrysalis of)-and-gown."

'You'll probably look better than a great ny of us with all our agony, Dale," laughed lita, who bore the distinction of being the althiest girl of the class as well as first cousin the much discussed Milton Youngfoot. "I ieve you could wear burlap and get away h it. And further, I expressly forbid you erting the crowd on Graduation Day."

The girls all knew something of Dale Treadll's history. She had come to the University ietly, unostentatiously, but by her personal arm she drew to herself the best girls of the ". She made no pretentions, and when a v inquisitive ones sought outside informan regarding her, they found she had dended from first families.

Now, when graduation approached, she prered for it in her usual simple way, and was ieved of the makeshifts others had to prace because of their former pretentions, so, ile the other girls spoke of "radium crepe," rocaded crepe de chine," "embroidered rsian crepe," and the like, she planned a uple silk mull to be fashioned by her own nds, for she could not give the order, "send bill to father."

But though Dale spoke cheerfully, there re pangs in her heart. She was, after all, st a girl, like the rest of them, and though e did not crave a gown such as Melita Granı would wear (rumor had it that it was to st five hundred dollars, though, Melita's e breeding kept her from telling the price), r such as Valerie Perok would display (Vale frankly told that her dress would cost ree hundred dollars—but then, Valerie figurculture by the financial yard), still Dale l long to have one of the pretty gowns which d been advertised during the past weeks the big shops of the city of which the unirsity town was a suburb.

As they chatted, another girl came into the om.

"Hello, bunch!" she greeted. "I'm looking r Dale Treadwell. Here's a letter from a agazine. 'By their stamps shall ye know em.' It's not a returned manuscript, so is most likely a check. What sort of a story d you send them? 'Mary Ann's Lover'?" id with a flip, the merry-hearted girl aeroaned the letter to Dale, who caught it, her art a-flutter.

She ripped it open.

"Oh, girls! It is a check! And for fifty ollars! I wonder if some kind angel didn't hisper to that editor that by accepting the ory he would help a poor college girl secure er graduation gown!"

The girls crowded about Dale and rejoiced ith her, for all could point to some favor or ind act Dale had done for them in some unbtrusive way. Even Melita Grandin, the ovely and wealthy, had such a debt, and as or the noveau riche Valerie Perok, she would ave gone down on her knees to Dale, had Dale demanded it, she was so obligated.

"When shall you go to town for your dress, Dale?" asked Melita.

"This afternoon, for the day after tomorrow s graduation day," returned Dale, and with heart dancing, she sprang up, and prepared to atch the 2.15 into town.

On her way an array of gowns passed before ier mind's eye. The nice part of it was that he could spend the whole fifty dollars for he dress. She had been quietly preparing or graduation since early in the year and had ecured white silk pumps, silk stockings and ll the other little trappings that a modern, well-dressed girl needs.

The city was reached, and leaving the train, Dale walked rapidly into the great waiting-room.

As she hurried along, she suddenly noticed a girl, apparently in distress. The girl looked so young, so inexperienced and so frightened that she could not, somehow, conscientiously leave her to her troubles.

Still for a moment Dale hesitated, disliking to—as one might indignantly say—"butt in", and yet feeling that by not inquiring, she might be neglecting a Christian duty.

So she approached the girl.

"You seem to be in trouble, dear," she began. "May I help you? Are you sick?"

As she spoke, Dale was relieved to see that her inquiry was taken in the right spirit, for the girl looked up, and gratitude showed in her scared eyes.

"I'm not sick, Miss," the girl replied, "except homesick and scared. I am in dreadful trouble, though I don't think you will care to help me when you hear what I have done."

"If you need help, I'm sure I'll be glad to assist you," Dale replied in her sympathetic voice, for the girl looked scarce more than nineteen years. "Perhaps what you have done isn't so dreadful as it seems to you."

"Oh, but it is, it is!" exclaimed the girl, bursting into tears. "I've run away from my husband!"

"You ran away from your husband!" exclaimed Dale. "Why, that is dreadful, surely, but even that can be condoned sometimes. What did he do to cause you to do such a thing?"

"Oh, he did nothing to cause me to do it. I've been a silly little fool, and thought he wasn't in sympathy with me and didn't appreciate my talent and all that," the girl replied.

Her incoherent words didn't mean anything to Dale, but she was astute enough to see that there had been a sad mistake committed by the young wife, so seating herself beside the girl on the bench which, fortunately, was otherwise unoccupied and screened from observation by the other tiers of benches, she said:

"Suppose you tell me all about the matter, and then we'll see what can be done."

"Oh, it will be such a relief to tell someone my troubles. Strangers sometimes understand so much better than friends and relatives, don't they? I'll tell you all about it. I live in Westbury. Westbury is a small town, but we have nice times there. I belonged to the Westbury Dramatic Club and I always made a hit in the plays we produced. But I wanted to do bigger and better things and I longed to go into the movies."

The girl paused. Dale did not interrupt, but through her mind flashed the decision: "Movie-struck!"

"I always told Jasper that I felt I was destined to become a great actress," the girl resumed, "but he'd only laugh and say that friends' criticism which made allowances for our being amateurs was no criterion to judge one's fitness for the commercial stage."

"Verily, Jasper is a pretty level-headed husband," thought Dale, but she only said: "There is truth in what he says, of course, but still he might be wrong."

"So I thought, and I determined to find out. I sent my picture to a booking agency and they wrote and said I photographed well and advised me to come to the city and that they would procure me a place as an extra at once, and if I made good, they would take me on as a regular. You know how all the stars began. Their stories read like the most wonderful imagination."

"And most likely are," Dale mentally supplemented.

Again the young woman paused. Then she continued:

"But now that I have taken the step, I am afraid."

"Afraid of what, dear?" asked Dale. "These people have promised you a position as an extra, and a regular place shortly. Your career seems to be laid out for you. Why, then, should you regret it? Go ahead and finish the course you have taken. It may cost you your husband, but then a public career like this demands a sacrifice, and surely no sacrifice is too great to shine among the movie stars!"

"Oh, I reasoned that way, but I find I can't make it. I love my husband and I want to go home!"

Dale put her arm about the girl's shoulders.

"That's what I wanted you to say, dear. Well, then, there is just one course left for you to pursue. Go straight back home, tell your husband and I'm sure he'll forgive you."

"Oh, I would but now I am afraid, for if the people of Westbury find out it would disgrace Jasper forever."

"They need not know. You did not tell them?"

"No. I wrote a note to Jasper (who is now in Omaha on a business trip) telling him what I was doing, but if I went straight back home, I'd get home before he will. And to the neighbors I merely said that I was going to visit my sister in Red Wing. If I come back directly, they'll never know what I have done. But I'm afraid because these people have my picture and letters?

"What difference does that make?" queried Dale. "You wrote to a reliable booking agency did you not?"

"I don't know anything about them. I—I—supposed they were all right. Yet, as I came down, all sorts of doubts crept into my mind, and I recalled all the dreadful things that I have heard happen to women who came alone to strange cities."

"Was someone from the agency to meet you here?" asked Dale.

"Yes," the girl replied.

"Well, then, you'd better go right back home and when they call, they'll not find you."

"I—I can't. I haven't the money," sobbed the girl.

"You came without money!" exclaimed Dale.

"Yes. I didn't think it right to take any of Jasper's money for this purpose. My railroad fare and what I'd need for incidentals I saved from special work I did at home in my spare time and it was honestly earned and entirely mine. These poeple wrote that I would make expenses right from the start so I didn't think I'd need anything beyond a few dollars. And the fare back to Westbury is over thirty dollars!"

Thirty dollars!

Dale involuntarily clutched at her purse. Since she had befriended the girl, it seemed logical that she should supply the money for the young woman to return home. To do that, however, would mean to forfeit her own graduation dress. Yet, after all, what was a mere gown compared with the saving of a broken home and the girl from a fate that made her shudder to think of it. She intuitively confirmed the girl's suspicions.

She was brought to sudden decision by the approach of a man. He was big physically and, though a trifle loudly dressed, appeared, offhand, perfectly respectable.

He scanned every woman as he came along, and finally reached Dale and her companion. The girl paled.

"Oh, how'do. You are Mrs. Madge Evans?" he began.

The girl nodded, but shrank closer to Dale's side.

"You are——Dale began.

"Jack Whitney," the man replied.

"Oh, yes. I don't really know what you'll think, Mr. Whitney, when I tell you why I am here. I am Madge's dearest friend, and when she confided to me that you were going to put her into the movies, I begged her to let me go along. Will you try and get me a place, too?"

"Sure, Miss, sure. What's your name?"

"Mine? Oh, I won't tell you my real name, but the one I'd like to have in the movies. You may call me Merlina Travels. Wouldn't that look well on the screen?"

"Very," returned Mr. Jack Whitney. "But let's go. I'm in a hurry."

"But, Mr. Whitney! You haven't identified yourself, and you know a girl cannot be too careful when she comes alone to a great city."

"Oh, I'm all right. Here's Mrs. Evans's picture, and three letters she sent us."

Dale extended her hand with perfect confidence and received the letters and photographs. She looked compassionately at the sweet, but brainless beauty that looked back at her from the photograph, then drew the letters from their envelopes.

"These are the letters you wrote, Madge, are they not?" she queried.

"Yes," gasped the girl, apparently frightened at the high hand with which Dale was handling the matter.

"You sent three?" continued Dale.

"Here, what's the question?" demanded Whitney. "It's all right, ain't it? Them's the letters you sent and the picture. I guess I'm all right, I am. Let's go!"

"Let's do nothing of the kind. Mr. Whitney," said Dale. "You may, but we remain."

"You——" he began with a fearful oath, and making to snatch the picture and letters from her. But Dale thrust them behind her back.

"Be careful, sir! You are violating the law——"

Mr. Whitney backed—and backed into the arms of a stranger, who, however, seemed to know his quarry.

"Come along, Jack! We're looking for you. Was he annoying you, ladies?"

"No," Dale replied, "but," and she smiled archly into the eyes of the detective, "I think he was on the verge of it."

"In that case, then, you need not appear against him, but we have enough of the goods on him without your testimony," the man said, tightening his grip on Mr. Whitney's shoulder.

It was too much for poor Mrs. Evans. She fainted.

A crowd gathered, and from it came a man, refinement and good breeding in his every movement. He brought a paper cup filled with water, which he extended to Dale, who held it to the girl's lips.

Then there was a dazzling flash! An enterprising young newspaper reporter photographed the scence for his newspaper. Mrs. Evans's face was hidden, but Dale got the full benefit of the flashlight.

Then the reporter disappeared.

Now there would be publicity! But hoping that she would not be recognized, Dale let it pass; there was nothing else to do.

The crowd dwindled away; the refined young man disappeared likewise, and soon the two girls were left alone.

"Do you feel better, dear?" queried Dale.

"Yes, but it seems as if I were dreaming," returned Madge. "Oh, what shall I do?"

"You'll go home on the next train, and I'll see you safely aboard."

"But the money," wailed Madge.

"I'll buy your ticket," Dale said calmly.

"Oh, thank you!" exclaimed Madge, thinking, no doubt, that Dale was well endowed with this world's wealth. And, indeed, she did give that impression. "Mr. Evans will send it back to you right off, and if he shouldn't forgive me, I'll work so hard and pay it up myself. Do you think Mr. Evans will forgive me?" she interpolated wistfully.

"Surely I do," returned Dale, and we might say here, that Dale judged Jasper Evans correctly.

"How did you know that man was such a fraud?" continued Mrs. Evans.

"I didn't know," Dale returned, "but I suspected it and determined to act as if I were sure of myself. His kind would have attempted blackmail if he had gotten away. Here is your picture and the letters. Show the letters to your husband so that he will know that, to you, this whole matter was a strictly business proposition."

Dale then purchased the girl's ticket, also a berth in the Pullman and pressed the balance of the money for incidental expenses, and then they sat talking until it neared train time. Dale then saw the girl safely aboard and sighed with relief when the train pulled out of the train-shed.

Then she sought the suburban train, and picked up the evening edition of the paper. There was the story in scare-heads.

Fortunately no names were mentioned, and while Dale was recognizable in the picture had one been so intent, casually she would escape recognition.

She reached the "U" and went directly to the dormitory.

"What kind of a dress did you get, Dale?" was the one question she got above the Babel.

"Lost my money," she replied nonchalantly.

"Not really!" It seemed as if the girls spoke as one.

"Yes, really," she smiled back. "I guess I was destined to wear my plain gown," and with the words, Dale quite indifferently took off her hat and tossed down the evening paper.

Estelle Clayton seized it, and the wild headlines attracted her at once.

"My gracious! How dreadful!" she exclaimed reading the article aloud.

"Dear me, Dale, that girl in the picture looks like you. Doesn't it, girls?" queried Winnie Preston.

"And she's ordinarily so stupid!" thought Dale.

The picture was duly examined.

"It resembles Dale, that's all," said Melita—and that was final.

Graduation Day dawned a most lovely day. Something was scheduled for the entire day so the girls dressed early.

They received their diplomas in cap and gown and as valedictorian, Dale delivered her address thus garbed.

But when cap and gown were doffed and the girls bloomed out in their wonderful creations, Dale was seen only in fleeting glances, and when almost forcibly detained, she excused herself as soon as she could.

This was not at all to the liking of Melita Grandin, now piloting her handsome cousin Milton Youngfoot.

"I want you to meet Dale Treadwell so much, Milton," Melita said. "She's a perfect dear."

"I quite believe you," Milton answered.

"How do you know?" demanded Melita mischievously, for woman-like, seeing he intended to agree with her, she questioned his decision.

"I heard her in her valedictory address this morning, you must not forget," he returned saucily.

"Oh," returned Melita, then spying Dale with a group of the girls, she suddenly seized him by the arm and before Dale could escape, the introduction was made.

But why should she blush and drop her eyes? The girls all wondered. Was it that she was ashamed of her gown? Because she alone among them wore a simple gown that might be duplicated for a few dollars? Yet why should she? Men judge only by appearance and Dale looked lovely with the folds of her simple gown falling so softly about her, and the sheaf of pansies at her waist, so sweet, so brilliant and yet so modest and fresh (for Dale had cleverly bound damp tissue paper about the stems and held in the moisture with tin-foil—a florist's trick), added the color needed. Her trim heels and graceful ankles could be rivaled by none. Why then did she burn as if with humiliation?

Thus thought the girls.

Dale was not blushing because of her gown. Ah, no! It was because the elegant and charming Milton Youngfoot was no other than the refined young man at the railroad station who brought a cup of water to the fainting Mrs. Evans.

"I had the pleasure of meeting Miss Treadwell, alfresco as it were, the day before yesterday. You all know, of course, that she was instrumental in causing the arrest of that notorious Jack Whitney," and while the girls shrieked with astonishment he went on to detail the story.

"Dale Treadwell! Is that what you did with that fifty dollars? And you never said a word except that you had lost your money—you darling!" and Melita caught her in her arms.

Dale nodded, but her face was grave, then excusing herself, she left the group.

In the evening there was a farewell dance and to this Dale was obliged to go. But she avoided everyone.

During a dance, she wandered away to the banks of a little brook that flowed through the college grounds. Sitting there musing, she felt her cheeks flame anew. What must Mr. Youngfoot think of her? A bold, brazen hussy who wasn't afraid to accost a villain of the Jack Whitney type.

She did not hear a step approaching nor did she look up until Milton Youngfoot stood before her. He was immaculate in evening dress, every little detail carried to the finest point of nicety, and yet there was no suggestion of the dandy about him.

"Why do you avoid me Miss Treadwell?" he queried gently. "The girls all speak so highly of you that I—I rather thought I'd like to know you."

"You ask why?" Dale exclaimed, determined to tell him and have it over. "Because I am ashamed of my actions that day in the railroad station and I am sorry you betrayed me to the girls. You know how bold and brazen it was!"

"Bold! Brazen!" he exclaimed, looking at her, his eyes shining. Somehow that look shot a thrill of indefinable sweetness through her.

"Why, my dear girl!" he exclaimed. "Do you mean to say that you think your act of the other day bold, brazen? My word, what a funny little girl you are! You deprive yourself of a graduation gown, help a runaway wife to return to the protection of a home saved from being broken and are instrumental in causing the arrest of a notorious character and then you feel hurt and offended because your noble work is published to the world. Another would have sought laurels for it, and you think I think you brazen! No, no! I think you are the most wonderful woman I ever met. And do you know that you did me a great service?"

"I did you a great service?" queried Dale, amazed at the turn of events.

"Yes. It is truly wonderful how things come about. Madge Evans is a sister to a very dear friend of mine who lives in Westbury. When Jasper Evans went to Omaha, quite by chance Paul Overton (Madge's brother) went to their house. Finding no one at home, he let himself in to see if everything was all right, for perhaps you know that people in small towns are more free with their homes than city people are. Paul discovered Madge's note and, vaguely disturbed, he determined to open it, and thus learned what she had done. He hurried to telegraph but recollecting that he would thus betray his sister, he jumped into an automobile and drove to a distant town where he telegraphed me asking me to intercept Madge if I could. I arrived after you had the situation in hand, and then I sought the detective who arrived so opportunely. Then I disappeared again, because I did not want to embarrass Madge, though I stayed around until you saw her safely aboard her train. Then I followed you and finding that you returned to the University I knew that you were a college girl and that I could get Melita to introduce me."

Youngfoot paused for a few moments, then continued:

"I love Paul Overton like a brother and would do anything for him. If I had failed to intercept Madge and you saved her without my assistance, as you really did, don't you see it would make me feel as if you had done me a service?"

Dale was silent. During his entire explanation her head was whirling and her heart beating uncommonly fast. She did not know whether an answer was expected to his question and she gave none.

"I'm sorry if you didn't want the matter to be known, but believe me, Miss Treadwell, it has clothed you in a garment far more beautiful than any commencement gown you could have worn—the Christly mantle of the Good Samaritan. It has raised you above all other women in my eyes. Since that day, I could not wait until I met you to tell you of my admiration for you——"

"Mr. Youngfoot!" Dale exclaimed, shocked to her feet by the intimacy the conversation had taken. "You are forgetting yourself!"

"Oh, no I am not, Miss Treadwell," he answered very steadily, and Dale again thrilled. "A woman who could make such a sacrifice is the woman I want for a life-partner. I shall not ask you how you regard me, but I am going to try and win your love for you have won mine."

Was she dreaming? Was it possible that

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Brownie Douglas, waiting at Memorial Hall, Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, attracts the attention of two gentlemen, Adrian Dredmond, an Englishman, and Mr. Gordon who recognizes Brownie, she being an intimate friend of his sisters. Her father, dying before she is born, and her mother at her birth, she is adopted by her great aunt who gives her her name Mehetabel and brings her up to remember she is a direct descendant from the Scottish nobility. Her nurse calls her Brownie from the first. Adrian Dredmond picks up a costly cuff button with a large D, studded with brilliants and the word "Brownie" upon the back. That night Miss Mehetabel Douglas tells Brownie the story of her betrothal to Lord Dunforth, the ball given by Helen Capel's aunt, Lady Ruxley, her introduction to Count de Lusan, a man of questionable reputation, her refusal to cancel a dance at Lord Dunforth's command, Helen Capel's treachery in suppressing a note, her serious illness, her coming to America, where her father and mother soon died. She gives Brownie her jewels, including her engagement ring, coral cross and all other gifts from Lord Dunforth. That night she dies and upon the reading of the will Mr. Conrad, who has the care of her aunt's property admits using and losing money entrusted to him, leaving Brownie, after all debts and legacies to the servants are paid, two hundred dollars. Refusing help, she secures employment wiring hats. She is helped by Mattie Burnham, who wins her love, and in the public library Brownie, reading to her in French, attracts the attention of an elderly gentleman who asks if she is a teacher and speaks any other language, and would she teach. She would and mentions Ware and Coolidge where she is employed. His card bears the name of Wm. H. Alcott, M. D., who recommends her to his son-in-law, Mr. Coolidge, as being competent to superintend the education of his two younger daughters and to be a companion and interpreter on a proposed trip to Europe. Going to the Coolidge home, Mrs. Coolidge and the eldest daughter Isabel admit her personal charms but are jealous of her beauty and many accomplishments and hope her meeting Wilbur will be avoided. The wish fails. Boarding the steamer, Brownie is saved from an accident by Adrian Dredmond. Wilbur relieves him of further care and takes her to his mother and sister who realize Wilbur's infatuation for Brownie. Adrian Dredmond overhears their determination to prevent Wilbur's further attention. Going to London they take a house near where Miss Mehetabel lived. Wilbur buys tickets for the opera and insists that Miss Douglas shall go, too. Selecting her jewels, among which is a coral cross, Mrs. Coolidge is surprised to find her so radiant and decides it shall not occur again. Adrian Dredmond entering the Coolidge box, is introduced to Brownie and leaving escorts her to the carriage, where she receives insults from Mrs. Coolidge. Isabel, envious of Brownie's elegant dress and jewels, queries to her mother Brownie's honesty. Seeing her go for a walk, Isabel enters Brownie's room and securing her jewels takes them to her mother, who requests that Brownie, upon her return, be sent to her. She asks Brownie if she has anything in her possession not legally hers and accuses her of stealing jewels and clothing. Brownie questions her right to ask her, to enter her room and from under lock and key take her jewels and demands the return of the casket. Mrs. Coolidge, refusing, Brownie threatens legal measures for their return. Wilbur intercedes and promises upon his father's return justice shall be done. Knowing she is to leave he offers her the love and care that will protect. She refuses. Wilbur orders a cab and directs that Brownie be driven to "The Washington." Adrian Dredmond calls, requesting to see Miss Douglas. Isabel gives a wrong impression and their pain in learning she is dishonest. Asking for her address, she does not know and he leaves distressed and indignant. Wilbur sends it and Adrian going to "The Washington" fails to find her. Mr. Coolidge hires a detective without success. Going to Lady Peasewell's party, Isabel wears Brownie's jewels. She meets Sir Charles Randal, who conducts her to the conservatory. Passing Lord Dunforth, he detects the ring and demands where she got it, also the other jewels. Claiming they are heirlooms, did Mehetabel Douglas give them to her. They were my last gift to her. Sir Charles appears and Lord Dunforth begs her to forget what has occurred. Two years after Sir Charles's birth there was a prospect of an addition to the family. Lady Randal was traveling and returning a year later remarked it was hard to lose one's children. Mr. Coolidge coming back to New York, Lady Randal invites the Coolidges to Vallingham Hall. Walking with Sir Charles, Isabel hears a voice of unusual sweetness and later Lady Ruxley leaning upon the arm of a young lady meets her eyes with dread.

CHAPTER XXI.

CHICKENS COME HOME TO ROOST!"

THE next day cards were received at Vallinham Hall for the family and all guests, soliciting their presence at a grand state dinner, to be given by his lordship, the Earl of Dunforth, at his country residence at East Malling, about five miles from the west village.

A great deal of excitement prevailed in anticipation of this event, for all recognized the honor conferred by this invitation, as the earl occupied a high position in the world, and owned almost the whole township of East Malling, where Dunforth Castle was situated.

"What shall I wear, mamma?" Isabel asked, when they were talking over the event in their own room.

"That light blue velvet, with the pipings of white satin, and the stomacher of pearls, which came from Worth's last week, will be the most suitable, I think," returned Mrs. Coolidge, reflectively.

"That is the one I had in mind. It will be very becoming and with those coral ornaments, and a few flowers, it will be a very lovely costume," assented the dutiful daughter.

"I want you to look uncommonly well, Isabel, for I heard today that any one who is received by the Earl of Dunforth needs no better voucher in the first circles of London. Besides, he is a relative of the family, and it will be wise for you to secure their favor. By the way, has Sir Charles asked you to name the day yet?"

"No, and I've played my very prettiest to him this week, hoping he would. I've visited all those dirty cottages and hovels, and helped him plan a hundred disagreeable things for suffering humanity around us; but, apparently, he is so bound up in the woes of others that he cannot stop to consider things of such minor importance as his own happiness," replied Isabel, with bitter scorn, and with an ugly frown upon her brow.

"You must have patience, my dear. A great deal has been accomplished in his proposing to you, and in your acknowledged engagement."

"Patience! I feel as if I should go wild at times, with the constant restraint which I put upon myself."

"I know; you are behavmg beautifully," said Mrs. Coolidge, soothingly, who lived in constant fear lest there should be an outbreak. "Lady Randal," she went on, "thinks you are just about perfect; even the servants are all enthusiastic in your praise."

"If only the prize was secure," muttered Isabel, moodily.

"Only go on a little longer as you have begun and it will be, I am sure," purred her mother.

The day of the dinner party arrived.

A half hour before the Vallingham company were to start, Lady Randal knocked at Isabel's door.

"Excuse me, dear," she said, "but I wanted to see how you look before we start. I am particularly anxious that Lord and Lady Dunforth should be pleased with you. You know he is a relative of the family," she concluded, with an accent of pride.

"I heard something to that effect," responded Isabel; "but how is he connected?"

"His lordship and I are own cousins," explained Lady Randal, while her face clouded for a moment, as if from some painful thought.

Then suddenly changing the subject, she exclaimed:

"But I need not have been anxious about your appearance, for you are just lovely. You have exquisite taste, my love, and I shall feel quite proud when you are my daughter. This blue velvet is charming, and your hair is very becomingly arranged, while that stomacher of pearls is superb. But"—and she started suddenly, while her face grew crimson—"but where did you get those coral ornaments?" and her eyes were fixed in utter astonishment, and with something of terror in them, upon the elegant coral and diamond cross, and butterfly hair ornament, which Isabel has just fastened in her hair, and clasped about her neck.

Isabel colored violently at the question.

Could she never wear those things without some one's remarking them particularly, and continually reminding her that they were not her own?

Lady Randal marked her confusion, and feeling it might have appeared a rude question, hastened to add:

"Pardon me, but they are so like some that I once saw a long time ago, that I could not help exclaiming at the moment."

"Ah!" said Isabel, regaining her self-possession, and striving to speak indifferently; "I did not suppose there was another set like them in the world—they were made to order," and the lie slipped off her tongue without a quaver.

"It is a singular coincidence, surely," murmured Lady Randal, absently. "Did you ever know—" she began again, then suddenly checking herself, she added: "But, of course, you did not, for she must be over sixty if she is living now. It is strange, though. I could have sworn they are the same."

"What were you saying?" asked Isabel, who had not distinctly understood what she said last.

"Never mind, dear; but a lady whom I used to know had some ornaments very like these. Have you nothing else which will do to go with this costume?"

She seemed to dislike the idea of her wearing them.

"Oh, yes; I have plenty of others, but these look best with this light blue—they give a dash of color which it seems to need, and I prefer them."

"Well, never mind; you do look very nice, and," she added, partly to herself, "perhaps he will not notice."

Isabel created quite a sensation upon entering the great drawing-room at Dunforth, for there were many people present whom she had never met before, and all were quite anxious to see the bride Sir Charles had chosen.

His lordship was very gracious to her, and seemed desirous to atone for his rudeness on the night of Lady Peasewell's drawing-room, though Isabel noticed that a spasm of pain contracted his face when his eye first fell upon her as she was presented.

He introduced her to Lady Dunforth, who completely surprised her by turning to a gentleman at her side, and saying:

Miss Coolidge, allow me to present my grandson, Mr. Dredmond."

She looked up astonished, and the color flamed into her cheeks at his cold salutation and the well-remembered, scornful curl of his lips, as his critical eye took in every item of her costume from head to foot.

He, too, had recognized those lovely corals, with their diamond garnishings, and he longed to wrest them from her hair and bosom, and denounce her as the false-hearted woman he knew she was.

He, then, was the grandson of the Earl of Dunforth.

Isabel had known all along that he was heir to an earldom, but supposing it to be a nobleman by the name of Dredmond, she had never made any inquiries about the matter.

A feeling of chagrin came over her that she had not played her cards differently, for she knew the Dunforth wealth far exceeded that of the Randals.

A sense of fear, too, arose in her heart lest he should strive to influence Sir Charles against her.

Lady Randal had told her that she and Lord Dunforth were cousins, consequently Sir Charles and Adrian were connected and might he not tell him what he knew?

Later in the evening she was introduced to Lady Ruxley, whose acquaintance she had long desired to make, and whose favor she was most anxious to secure.

The old lady had arrived at the castle that morning by especial invitation, and was to remain a few days to visit Lady Dunforth, who was a favorite with her.

She was a very peculiar body, this old lady of eighty, with her wrinkled, withered face, her scant, wiry, gray hair, her restless black eyes keen and sharp as a briar. She was bent nearly double, and walked with a cane, and when she tried to talk to or look at anybody she twisted her neck and shoulders into all manner of contortions. She was little as well as old—she could not have weighed over ninety pounds—and in her straight, old-fashioned black satin gown she made Isabel think of some witch or sprite of evil.

She felt anything but comfortable beneath those keen, bright eyes, which seemed to read her through and through at a glance, and her blunt way of asking questions disconcerted her not a little.

"False as fair; false as fair!" and "chickens always come home to roost!" muttered the "old crone," as she watched the handsome couple move away.

"What were you saying, aunt?" asked Lady Randal, sharply.

She had been standing near, and saw the distrustful expression on her face, and heard the muttered tones.

"I said, 'chickens always come home to roost', " she snapped in reply.

"What do you mean by it? I don't understand you."

"I mean that you are going to get your pay through her for some of your own evil deeds in the past," she answered, pointing her shaking finger at Isabel.

"Don't be a fool, aunt," Lady Randal said, sharply, yet growing a shade paler than usual. "What have I done that is so very wicked?"

"Ah, ha! your memory doesn't serve you as well as mine, for all I am in my dotage," and the old woman gave a cracked, spiteful laugh.

"I haven't forgotten how, when you were yonder girl's age, you played a game upon his lordship in my house which nearly broke his heart, and without accomplishing your purpose, too; and now I say you're going to get your pay for it."

"That was years and years ago, and I'm sure I don't see what it can have to do with Sir Charles or my affairs today. Don't you like Miss Coolidge? I think her very striking in appearance."

"She has a stately presence, truly; but mark my words, Helen Capel, if you live long enough, you will find that she can plot as cunningly as you did when you admitted Count de Lusan to my parlors to ruin the happiness of an innocent and beautiful girl."

"Pshaw! what has put those absurd [illegible] and memories into your head tonight?" asked Lady Randal tried to laugh, though she shuddered at the same time.

"Laugh away, my lady, while you can," snapped the old woman, viciously, "but you will change your tune before long. I never would have forgave you for that night's work, Helen Capel; it was the first time such a man ever disgraced my house, to say nothing about her coming to such grief there. But, ah! that was more than forty years ago. I wonder whatever became of her! I am sorry for Charles, though—he is a noble fellow, and ought to have a good wife," and Lady Ruxley heaved a sigh of regret.

"Then you don't approve of his choice, aunt; I'm sorry. She is certainly fine looking, and then she belongs to a very wealthy family."

"That's it; that's it, you were never satisfied with what you had," was the impatient interruption. "You always want to hear the jingle of gold. I'd rather the boy would marry a girl like my companion, without a penny, than forty such stately, false-hearted dames, with a million apiece."

"You continue to like the girl as well as ever, then," said Lady Randal, glad to change the subject.

"Like her! There isn't her equal here tonight, for all you were so sure I'd be taken in. I tell you, Helen, these eyes of mine are good yet, if they have been well used for eighty years."

"Where is she tonight?"

"Upstairs, reading; she would not come down, though I tried hard enough to make her. But go along to your friends, an old woman like me is not worth minding, besides, I'm going to bed presently."

She waved her hand the same as she had to Isabel, and Lady Randal moved away, feeling anxious and miserable, despite her assumed indifference.

Unpleasant memories had been rudely aroused tonight, and the sting of conscience, mingled with remorse, was severe.

"Whatever could have made her rake up those old times?" she muttered, uneasily, as she glanced at her son, who was hovering about Isabel like a moth about a candle. "Can it be that she also noticed those jewels? It is lucky for me that Lord Dunforth never discovered the part I played in that tragedy—he never would have forgiven it. I wonder what I did with that note—destroyed it, I suppose. Oh, dear! what a memory Aunt Ruxley has, it is as keen as her tongue, and she has made me exceedingly uncomfortable; for I would not offend her for anything, on Charles's account. I do hope he will be happy, and that he has chosen wisely; he is too good to be deceived— he is like his father, poor man! Ah, me! how many men have been taken in by the girls they have married; however, it is too late to be helped now."

Such were Lady Randal's reflections after leaving her aunt.

Doubtless she has been recognized before this as being the girl of whom Miss Mehetabel Douglas had told Brownie as having been the cause of her lifelong misery.

Yes, Lady Randal was that same Helen Capel. Finding, after she has accomplished her foul purpose, that she could not console her cousin, Lord Dunforth, for his loss, she turned her charms in another direction, and at last succeeded in winning a good and true man, Sir Ralph Randal, for a husband.

She had not lived the pleasantest life in the world with the baronet, or rather, it should be said, that he had discovered his mistake when it was too late.

She could not deceive him always, and after the irrevocable step had been taken he found that instead of a true, loving, and domestic wife, he had been entrapped into marrying a vain, frivolous girl, who cared more for fashion and society than she did for her family. His death had not seemed to break her heart, for after the year of mourning expired, she returned to society with as much zest as ever.

But when her eldest son was taken from her she felt the blow more keenly, and it seemed to change her.

Charles, the younger son, had always been the favorite, and she feared lest she should lose him, too, and from that time she devoted herself to him, and during her later years bound herself

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

THE COMFORT Sisters' Pin, given to the sender of the best recipe, is awarded this month to Mrs. Mickey Reynolds of Brooklyn, New York. Mrs. Reynold's recipes required no corrections or rewriting as she gave the exact quantity of everything used and the method of combining the different ingredients. This is most important to the inexperienced cook and constitutes a "best recipe."

RICE PERLOW.—One-quarter pound of salt pork, chopped fine, one large onion, chopped very fine, one can of tomatoes (size 2) and one cup of washed uncooked rice. Put salt pork in skillet and render until a golden brown. Keep it hot, then add the onion and cook until onion is light yellow color. Add the entire can of tomatoes and let all boil for five minutes, then put mixture into a saucepan and add the uncooked rice. Cook it with a constant stirring for twenty minutes or until rice is done (each grain of rice should be separate). If tomato liquid should all be used before rice is thoroughly cooked add three tablespoons of water and stir. Salt and pepper to be added after serving, as the salt pork sometimes is enough.—MRS. MICKEY REYNOLDS, Brooklyn, 4802 Ave., M., N. Y.

SULTANA DAINTIES.—Cream one-fourth cup of butter, gradually beat in one-half cup of sugar, add one beaten egg, two teaspoons of milk, one-half teaspoon of vanilla, and one rounding cup of flour sifted with one teaspoon of baking powder. Add more flour if necessary. Cut into rounds, using a cutter with scalloped edge. Line fancy individual tins, prick with a fork and bake in a quick oven. Remove from tins and cool.

FILLING.—Beat the yolks of two eggs until a light yellow, gradually add one-half cup of sugar, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, one-third teaspoon of nutmeg, three tablespoons of finely rolled cracker-crumbs, one cup of thick sour cream and one and one-third cup of clean Sultana raisins. Stir until well blended, then cook in a double boiler until the mixture thickens, stirring constantly. Cool. Fill the shells, and top with the beaten whites of the eggs to which two tablespoons of powdered sugar and a few drops of vanilla have been added. Two tablespoons of strained honey in place of the sugar and vanilla make a delicious combination.

BERRY PIE.—Sift together two cups of flour, one-half teaspoon of soda, one teaspoon of cream of tartar and one-half teaspoon of salt. Rub in one-fourth cup of butter or rendered chicken fat. Beat one egg, add one scant cup of milk and beat into the dry ingredients. Bake in a biscuit oven in a round tin until brown. Split, butter, and fill with mashed and sweetened berries. Spread the top with white of egg beaten with enough strained honey to sweeten, with whipped cream, and decorate with whole berries. This same dough can be made into a thin cake spread with quarters of fresh peaches or apple, sprinkled with sugar and baked in an oven not quite so hot.

TAMALI PIE.—Two pounds round steak and a small piece of suet cut into two-inch cubes. Cover with water and boil one hour. Then add twenty olives, twenty raisins, salt to taste, one clove of garlic, one tablespoon ground chili pepper. Just before it is cooked, thicken with two tablespoons of cornmeal. For the crust, use three-quarters cup of butter melted in one quart of salted boiling water. Stir in corn meal to make a thick mush, then pour into shallow pan to cool. When cold, line sides of baking pan, pour in the meat mixture and cover top with mush and bake slowly one hour.—MRS. A. J. HAVERLAND, Santa Barbara, R. R. 1, Calif.

PASTRY SQUARES.—These are made of pastry that has a small amount of leavening so as to resemble butter crackers. One cup of sifted flour, again sifted with one-fourth teaspoon of baking powder. With the tips of the fingers work into the flour one-third cup of butter until it is of a mealy consistency. With a knife gradually work in three tablespoons of cold water. Lightly make into a ball with floured hands, and roll thin. Cut into squares and place in biscuit tins. Spread lightly with any kind of firm jelly, or dust with mixed cinnamon and sugar, or sprinkle with grated cheese. Bake in a quick oven, taking care they do not burn.

NUT POUND CAKE.—Place in a mixing bowl, one and one-quarter cups of sugar, three-quarters cup of butter and yolks of five eggs. Cream well and then add three cups of flour, three level teaspoons baking powder, one-half teaspoon salt, one cup of nuts, chopped fine, and one cup of sweet milk. Beat to a smooth mixture. Beat the whites left from the five yolks to a stiff froth and fold them into the smooth mixture. Turn all into a large pan with tube in center. Have pan greased well and lightly dusted with flour. Bake in moderate oven for fifty minutes.—MRS. MICKEY REYNOLDS, Brooklyn, 4802 Ave. M., New York.

BEEF LOAF.—Two pounds of beef, one and one-half pounds of veal, three-quarters pound salt pork, two eggs, one small cup of cracker-crumbs, one small cup of cold water, one-half teaspoon salt, one-quarter teaspoon pepper. Put meats through food chopper, add other ingredients and stir until well mixed. Put into mold. I use a long bread tin for mold. Turn out in roaster and add one cup of hot water. Put thin slices of onion on top of loaf with bits of butter. Bake two hours in oven, or until well cooked and brown.—MRS. LUCY MIDDAUGH, Johnson City, 18 Roberts St., N. Y.

SALMON LOAF.—Drain juice from one can of salmon, free from bones and rub smooth with two tablespoons of butter. Add three-quarters cup cracker-crumbs, rolled fine. Moisten with one-half cup sweet milk. Season with one-half teaspoon each salt and pepper. Beat two eggs well and add last. Bake in buttered pan one hour.—MRS. JESSIE CHEDSTER, Castana, Iowa.

BERRY PIE.

PEANUT SOUP.—Heat two cups of milk in double boiler, add four tablespoons of peanut butter and season to taste. Serve with crisped crackers.—MRS. MAMIE WILLIAMS, Ipe, Tenn.

DROP BISCUITS.—Two cups flour, four teaspoons baking powder, one-half teaspoon salt. Have melted two tablespoons of lard, mix it with one tablespoon of sugar and stir in one cup of milk, then sift in the flour, salt and baking powder. Use more flour if necessary as it must be a stiff batter to drop from the spoon. Mix and beat well. Drop on a greased baking pan and bake in hot oven until brown. Before putting in oven brush with milk. These can be had on short notice.—MRS. LOUIS R. IAGER, Ellicott City, Md.

BUTTERLESS, EGGLESS, MILKLESS CAKE.—Cook one cup of raisins twenty minutes with enough water to make a cup of juice when done. Remove raisins from juice and to hot juice add one tablespoon of lard and set aside to cool. When cool, add one teaspoon soda, one cup of white or brown sugar, a pinch of nutmeg, one level teaspoon allspice, one level teaspoon cinnamon and one-quarter teaspoon cloves, using ground spices; a pinch of salt, two cups of flour and add raisins last. Bake in moderate oven one hour.—HAPPY HOMESTEADER, Moorcroft, Box 83, Wyo.

MOCK SAUSAGE.—Soak one cup of lima beans over night, slip the skins, cover with cold water and cook until soft, stirring frequently. Drain and save the juice. Mash the beans and add one and one-half cup of soft bread-crumbs, one cup of rich hot milk, one tablespoon of sausage or bacon fat, one egg beaten a very little, salt, pepper and one-fourth teaspoon of ground sage. Mix well, adding enough of the bean juice to handle. Poultry dressing may be used for flavoring. Shape into rolls, fry in deep fat or bake on a greased tin. Serve with potatoes prepared as follows: Peel and cut into eighths, soak one hour in cold water, toss in a little salad oil or bacon fat, sprinkle with salt and bake in a hot oven, stirring occasionally.

FEATHER CAKE.—One cup each of sugar and sweet milk, one egg, one tablespoon of butter, two cups of flour sifted with two tablespoons of baking powder, a pinch of salt and lemon extract to flavor. Bake in layers. I use caramel filling as follows: One cup of brown sugar, one-half tablespoon of butter and one-half cup of cream. Boil until soft ball stage is reached, then beat until cool enough to spread between layers and on cake.

DOUGHNUTS.—This is the best recipe for doughnuts I have ever tried and the least expensive. Made this way they seldom tear or soak fat. Beat well together one egg and one cup of granulated sugar, add one-half pint sweet milk. Sift one pint of flour, one and one-half teaspoons baking powder, one-half teaspoon salt and one-half teaspoon grated nutmeg together and add to liquid mixture. Beat well, then add enough more flour to make a soft dough. Roll out one-quarter inch thick, cut in rings or small balls. Have ready a kettle with enough smoking-hot fat to cover doughnuts well. I use old-fashioned iron kettle and save the fat. Be sure fat is hot enough, if it is, a piece of dough dropped into it will immediately rise to the surface. Have a long fork and turn each one as it rises. Let brown. This recipe usually makes about three dozen doughnuts. When done, doughnuts may be drained and rolled in powdered sugar if desired. The main thing to remember is to have the grease hot and not put in too many doughnuts at a time.—MRS. WASH. G. LEE, Sparta, Tenn.

CREAMED SALT SALMON.—One and one-half pounds of salt salmon soaked in fresh water over night or the same amount of fresh salmon soaked in salt water over night. When ready to cook drain this water off and put in fresh water to cover well. Simmer slowly one hour. I buy my fish sliced one inch thick and when cooked I take it out with a skimmer carefully to keep from breaking. Thicken the liquid with one-half cup of flour mixed with milk. Add rich milk to make it about the thickness of cream. Pour over fish, garnish with home canned boiled beets, or in place of beets use hard boiled eggs. The beets should be quite tart to make the right combination.—MRS. LEON H. FRINK, Plainfield, Conn.

SINCE the appearance of Ruby Nelson's letter, in February issue, on The Ideal Husband, and my suggestion for more letters on the same subject, eighty-two have been received, dealing with husbands, ideal and otherwise. The reading of these letters has been most interesting, as well amusing in some instances, and as many as there is space for are printed below. Some other month, if these are favorably received, more will be printed. Since reading these letters I've gone back to a belief in Santa Claus.—Ed.

VANCOUVER, R. R. 2, BOX 70, WASH.

DEAR SISTER WILKINSON AND COMFORT FOLKS:

Please let me come in again for I am in difficulty since my letter was printed in February. You see, I signed my name without its title "Mrs." and a lot of the young men reading it took it for granted I was a "Miss" and wrote to tell me their views on the subject, also their qualifications as an ideal husband. It keeps me busy setting them right. Some of them think my ideals a little too high and not to be found on this mundane sphere, or, if to be found, very rare indeed. Others have ideals of a wife that are as high but claim they've never met one. One and all agree that a husband such as I described would be ideal. I know personally several ideal husbands; so know they are possible.

Now I am not an inexperienced girl, but a widow 41 years old, with four children, two boys and two girls, ranging in age from seven to eighteen years of age. My husband died from consumption in October, 1921 at the age of fifty-two years. Although he was not in all ways my ideal, our marriage of twenty-two years was as happy as the average. Therefore, I did not write to make you married sisters discontented with the choice you made, for love overlooks many faults. The only way for any one to get along is to use Christian forbearance. But I write rather to the girls and widows and I say, cling to your high ideals. The higher they are the more chance we have of growing better. Thank God, it is possible to "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior." Sisters, I believe good, honest, clean, industrious Christian boys and men are not as scarce as they would have us believe. Come on girls, write to our corner and let's show these brothers that we care for higher things than a "good time". To be a wife in the truest sense is to be the best thing on earth. Next to purity and goodness of heart, good sense is the best dowry any woman can have. We should study to make ourselves worthy of a good mate. Cultivate all those graces that make a happy home. It is not so much the accomplishments, or physical characteristics, or external considerations, as it is the character that makes home happy. The beautiful in heart is a million times more successful in securing domestic happiness than the beautiful in person.

Mrs. Wilkinson, have you closed our corner to the men? They would like to express their ideas on this subject and it would be both helpful and interesting to hear how they regard ideals. One man wrote me suggesting there wouldn't be many marriages if all girls kept to such high ideals. Is not that another way of saying we shouldn't expect our husbands to be better than the average? I say it is time to bring up the average rather than lowering it by asking less. It is because women condone tobacco using that so many men use it. A man should have as noble aspirations as a woman. A noble woman wants to look up to a husband; how can she if she realizes his ideals are lower than her own? "What fellowship has light with darkness?" St. Paul admonishes, "See that the wife reverence her husband," and he also says, "A widow may marry whom she will, only in the Lord," and again "A husband should love his wife as his own body." I belong to the Dunkard Progressive Brethren Church and we believe in divorce for the cause Jesus gave, and take the New Testament as our rule of faith and practice.

As my children and I own our home of 128 acres, four miles from Vancouver, and my father lives with us, you may be sure I can well afford to wait until I see that ideal before I marry again. Mrs. McVey and Mrs. Rockstroh, I am sure we all love to hear of romances like yours.

If my letter is not already too long I will give a short description of this part of Washington. It is a lovely country, still covered with plenty of fir and cedar timber, also oak, hickory, willow and dogwood. The woods have a succession of wild flowers. First in the spring we have the white trilliums and red currant blossoms, the yellow blossoms of Oregon grapes, then violets, flag lilies, lilacs, spirea, hawthorne and dogwood, ferns, Scotch bloom, lady's slippers, goldenrod and many more. Rhododendron is our state flower.

The country generally is level, but with some hills. Springs are common and our rivers are full of salmon and smelt. The soil is fertile, varying from gravelly loam to beaverdam. The climate is wet with cool summers and mild winters. Prune raising and dairying are the two most important sources of our wealth but Clarke County also raises commercially, potatoes, onions, cabbage, strawberries, apples, pears and chickens. Lumbering is an important industry here, too.

Folks, when you write to me I will do my best to answer anyway, but will appreciate a stamp. I am an amateur photographer and will exchange snapshots. I am interested in so many things that life is never dull to me—children, home, farming, flowers, books, music, fancywork, the W. C. T. U., and Club Work, Sunday Schools and most of all, the extension of Christ's Kingdom on earth.

God bless all the members of COMFORT's big family. Your loving sister, MRS. RUBY C. NELSON.

NEW YORK, 467 W 159th ST., N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I wonder if you will welcome a young girl from a big city to your COMFORT Sisters' Corner. I really do find comfort in reading the varied ideas of people in different walks of life. It is when one sees the pros and cons of different topics so closely discussed that one can pick the right and wrong of it at a glance. That is where the comfort comes in.

I was very much interested in Ruby C. Nelson's Ideal Husband. I too, think it promises to be a very interesting discussion. Would you like to hear what my ideal is like? To begin with, I don't expect him to be anywhere near perfect. Don't you find that sometimes you like people for their faults instead, in spite of them? Well, I'm not going to discuss faults. I want to tell you what qualities in a man I admire most.

My ideal husband is broad-minded. He is a devoted lover of music and of nature. He is intellectually inclined; for that is the road that leads to broad-mindedness which you will note is my first condition. By this I do not mean that his brain is so much of a storehouse for extracts from philosophy—but I do mean that in order to be a kindred spirit of mine, he must understand and take an interest in the fundamentals of life (that is, to have formed his opinions on religion, politics, human and spiritual life.) He is gentle and especially considerate of the old and feeble. He is of a loving and sympathetic nature—yet a man in every sense of the word. I do not agree with Ruby on her second point of total abstinence from tobacco and desiring her ideal husband to be a teetotaler. In fact, a Morris chair and a pipe have always been part of my dream of happy married life. Then again, I see no harm in an occasional glass of beer with the meals. But with the present prohibition law we need hardly argue on that point. Of course my ideal husband must love me above everything else in the world. I meant to make that my first condition. Then, I might add that I have always pictured him as being dark complexioned with black hair and brown eyes.

I would love to have someone write me about their life in the country. I would reciprocate by telling of mine in the city. Do you know, I simply detest the city. My earnest desire is that some day I shall be able to live in Nature's own beautiful country.

I notice that you all describe yourself, so here goes—I'm 19, but not the flapper type, five feet two inches slim, brown hair, hazel eyes. I'm not dark enough for a brunette nor light enough for a blonde. I hope I'll pass your censorship, sisters.

Very sincerely,

FRIEDA ROBINSON.

SOMEWHERE IN MARYLAND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

You left the latch-string out, a signal for a welcome, and here I am. COMFORT, dear old COMFORT, came yesterday and everyone, including Daddy Mine, reads it with delight and watches for its coming. It has been in our home ever since I was knee high to a duck. Hurrah! Three cheers for "The Key to Happiness." Long live COMFORT!

The discussion proposed by a sister for our Corner to tell of our ideal husband will be very interesting and heaps of fun sure. That "sure" betrays me. Yes, I am Irish, but don't begin to imagine a beauty. You'll miss me by a mile if you do. I have dark curls, eyes that are big and brown and look straight through things, but I forgot to kiss the Blarney Stone.

Now for my ideal. Here's what I'd ask for in that dream man o' mine. Not to be as handsome as Apollo and as wise as—" you know the rest of that quotation, but just to be a real pal and in every sense of the word a man. Faults—why, of course, he'd have them. He wouldn't be a man if he didn't. I don't want an angel, wings and all. Just give me a man with an honest face, frank ways, a loving, generous heart, brave and true, "For the bravest are the tenderest." These are the things I'd ask of the man I marry and which he must possess.

Mrs. Wilkinson, after the sisters are through, give the brothers a chance to tell their ideal of a wife and see how many of us measure up to it.

Thank you, it was dear of you to give me space.

So long, everybody,

MABEL CLARE.

Mabel Clare—One whole issue of the Sisters' Corner will be given over to the men, provided enough of them write, and, anyway, as many letters as are received will be printed. It is only fair to give them a chance to tell of their Ideal Wife.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT FRIENDS:

May I came in? Friends, isn't our dear old COMFORT paper just grand? It is indeed a comfort and isn't Mrs. Wilkinson the best ever?

May I say a few words to some of you married folks? First I want to repeat a story. It is about a woman who had been speaking of her husband who had just died. She said, "Frank always thought the best of me so I had to give him the best there was in me. It would have amazed him so to find out I could be petty and mean and little, that I had to be big. It would have horrified him to see me give way to my temper, so I learned to control myself. I learned how to do everything possible and became thrifty and economical because he married me under the delusion that I would be a good manager and run my end of the partnership as well as he ran his. He always made me feel that he expected great things of me, that I would always do the right thing in every situation; that I would have the courage, wisdom and patience and I tried not to disappoint him."

"He always thought the best of me and so I gave him the best there was in me." Friends, I wonder if that is not the real secret of how to make marriage a success. Some husbands and wives seem to believe the worst of each other and to call forth what is most disagreeable in each other's natures.

The average married couple lives in a state of perpetual bickering over trifles. No one ever expects the other to do the right thing under any circumstances, and they spend their time dwelling on each other's shortcomings.

Secretly, the husband may still admire his wife but he would die before he would tell her so. At the bottom of her heart a woman may think her husband a giant among other men, but wild horses could not drag admission from her. The man says, "What's the use of trying to be a good husband and a good provider for my family when all the thanks I get at home is criticism; because I don't do better." The woman says, "What's the use of me denying myself things that I want in order to save, and of cooking and sewing to make a comfortable home, when all the reward I get is a knock from my husband?"

Now a word to the jealous ones. The wife who is always watching her husband and who reads wrong his most innocent relations with other women will inevitably drive him into justifying her belief of him.

The man who will not give his wife a dollar to spend, or trust her out of his sight may rest assured that in the end she will outwit him and deceive him and be as false as he expects her to be. But there are not many men and women who do not repay faith with faith and who are not true to those who trust them.

We all try to be what people expect us to be, we give the best to those who expect the best. This is worth remembering, married people. As for the one who carries the pocketbook, I will say that if some women I know carried it it would always be empty.

Everyone is looking this way. They must be wondering who this chatterbox is. I'm just a fun-loving girlie with dark brown hair and eyes and am in my early twenties.

GIRLIE.

Girlie.—If you call yourself a chatterbox, then I hope we have more like you. Your matter is about the most worth while of anything I've heard for some time.—Ed.

REIDSVILLE, R. R. 4, BOX 182, N. C.

DEAR SISTERS, ONE AND ALL:

Even though I've been a constant reader of COMFORT all my life, this is my first attempt to gain admittance.

Ruby Nelson, you spoke my sentiments along the line of an ideal husband. Here's what I have to say about one. First of all, a man should be a Christian, regardless of his occupation. Second, industrious, clean-minded and honest. Third, in disposition loving and sympathetic. A man willing to take as well as give. Fourth, he should be intelligent and progressive, always ready to work until he has accomplished what he sets out to do.

I would be glad if my husband could like the things I like, because people thinking and believing the same can work together in greater harmony and accomplish more than those who never agree. I know people argue that the opposite always attracts but I don't believe it is the lasting attraction that holds people like those who have things in common.

I also think that lovers should talk over all things related to their future life. By so doing they learn to appreciate and respect each other more and you know that respect is the keynote of love. I know of a man and wife who perfectly understand each other and their life has been one long honeymoon. Both are working toward the same goal.

I would be glad to hear from all who care to write and will try to answer all.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters, I am

Very sincerely,

MARY SCOTT.

TULSA, OKLAHOMA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

When I read Ruby Nelson's letter regarding her ideal husband, I had to laugh. It reminded me of the time, when I was about sixteen, that I wrote a list of my ideal husband's qualifications (or perfections), to wit:

First, he must be at leat ten years older than myself, six feet in height, black hair and eyes, manly, straightforward and gentlemanly. Must refrain from intoxicants and tobacco in any form, must be a Presbyterian and an earnest Christian, and lastly, must have plenty of money.

Well, I measured my gentlemen friends by that standard until I was twenty-three years of age. Then, Mr. Right came along and the look into his bright blue eyes went straight to my heart and five weeks later we were married. Never once did I Lesard smiled wickedly as his hard hand closed on the money.

The two sank down on a pile of bricks behind a boarding.

The man let her pass him, took a quick stride, and had her in his arms with one hand heavy on her mouth.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Hamilton dies poor, leaving two daughters, Gillian and Jacqueline, to the care of his father's housekeeper. Mr. Marchmont, in league with his butler, housekeeper and Lesard, buys Hamilton Place and is anxious to adopt both girls that he may gain admittance to the neighboring houses. Jacky refuses; finding Gill in tears begs her not to stay if unwilling. Gill admits there was someone in London and he writes he cannot have her for his wife. She refuses to give his name. Three months later and she wonders why Marchmont adopted her and wishes there had not been the burglary at Lord Hollis's. Lesard, in love with Jacky, will care for her. If alone she would marry him, but she must go to Gill, who is unhappy. Lesard warns her not to go—it is no place for any woman; but asks her to trust him. Mrs. Gibbs, the housekeeper, engages a new maid, Mary James, who is Jacky in disguise. Gill confesses her fears that Marchmont is an impostor and cautions Jacky to avoid him, and Jacky knows Lesard is right. Mrs. Gibbs tells Jacky she is to accompany Gill and Mr. Marchmont to Sir Simon Wellford's, where there is to be a grand party. Jacky, that night, spies three men, Marchmont, a stranger and Lesard, and hears from him, "here's luck to the ball." She gets Gill ready for the visit and at Lady Wellford's has a room next to Gill's. Sir Charles Vivian takes Gill into dinner. The ball follows and Gill smuggles Jacky in dressed in a white domino, where she recognizes Lesard in the guise of a monk and fails to make him reveal his identity, leaving her baffled. Following him and Gill in search of Jacky, they see the robbery and rather than make an outcry Gill admits he is her husband. With the guests at supper a robbery is committed. Mrs. Fareham's jewels are missing and only Gillian's jewel case left. Detectives arrive and Sir Charles Vivian's statements, as to his movements before the dinner, relieve him and Gill of suspicion. Jacky reads his last letter to Gill, and while loathing the man whom she believes has wronged both, she knows they are not strong and brave enough. Marchmont insists that Gillian shall appear at dinner and Jacky late in the evening slips down-stairs, opens a door, standing behind it. She recognizes the voices of Lesard and Brookes and the latter calls, "All clear," and she sees Marchmont, Brookes and Lesard who is bringing the jewels, which he carries in his belt, the stones removed by Marchmont and Lesard laying the canvas belt in the place uncovered. Struggling she gains the passage back, her hands bleeding. Jacky hears Brookes query why Lesard goes out the other way and what will prevent his coming back and taking it. Gillian goes to walk with Sir Charles Vivian and is joined by Jacky. She admits Jacky is her sister. Jacky discovers a flash of light. She has found the other way and someone is coming out from an opening in the wall which is well concealed by ivy and at the foot is a deep dark pool. It is Lesard. Jacky crawls in—the stones are undisturbed. Going out, she hears Gillian call, "Marchmont is back." He has seen the detective. Unless Lesard fails him he is safe. Gill and Jacky decide to get out at once. Jacky means to take the jewels. Lesard decides to have his share and starts for Hamilton Place. Jacky finds the jewels and is staggered by the weight. She fastens the belt around her body. In the collection is a necklace of stones clear and black. She hears someone coming. It is Lesard. Brookes, suspicious of him, goes with Marchmont to the cellar where he meets with an accident. Lesard, unconscious of Marchmont's presence, secures the black diamonds. Marchmont asks what he is doing and finding the belt gone grasps Lesard and feels a package under his shirt. He denies having the belt but something better—the black diamonds. Marchmont declares he has never touched the belt and if Lesard will put the necklace back he will share with him. Lesard attempts to leave. If he moves, Marchmont threatens to kill. There is the sound of a leap and Marchmont is dead. Jacky, kneeling beside him, leaves a bloody print of her left hand. The sisters make their escape in the dark and take the wrong road, finding a deserted hut, where they seek shelter and after resting they keep on to Colchester and take a train to London. Sir Charles Vivian is told of Marchmont's death by Lady Wellford who is afraid Gillian Hamilton did it and going to Hamilton Place learns that Mrs. Gibbs swears that Gillian murdered Marchmont. During the inquest the jury and coroner visit the secret passage and on the margin of the stream is the bloody imprint of a girl's hand. The jury and witnesses dismissed, Mrs. Gibbs returning to her room sees Lesard, and it is not the man she knows. He claims I am Lesard and will tell that Mary Gibbs is the same person as Mary Gresham as the man now is and yet is not Lesard who stands here, and all I care to know why you say those girls killed Marchmont. Jacky might be anything but he loves her. Gillian and Jacky read The Mystery of His Death Solved. Jacky going out walks to the house of the Red Mouse and seeing the necklace of black diamonds, upon her neck, declares that she buys them from Lesard who she knows is in London, and if he goes free she must hang.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE BLACK DIAMONDS.

IT was curious how the thought of that shabby girl in the street clung to the Red Mouse that night.

She found herself fingering the gorgeous stones that lay on her white breast almost nervously. She, the Red Mouse, who had never been nervous in her life. How did that pale girl who looked at her so queerly come to be loitering at her door the very first time she wore those diamonds, and how did she know they were bought from Lesard?

The Red Mouse clutched the necklace hard as she sat in her rose-colored and rose-scented drawing-room, where the scattered green tables were arranged as for an ordinary card-party.

The faces round the tables were those of men quiet and impassive outwardly. Now and then one got up and went away, and if he had lost he wasted no time on farewells to his hostess. It was not expected of him; the Red Mouse had no time for unlucky people.

Tonight it was only from habit that she kept a keen eye on the settling up. She took her gains mechanically

Suppose there was something wrong about those diamonds, that must be famous for a girl like that to have known them! Could Lesard have passed off stolen goods on her, taken her money for jewels that any day the police might take from her without redress!

When the last player had left the woman went to her own room with no lightness in her feet. She had been ready to sell all she owned to buy that necklace, and tonight she wished she had never seen it. Money was the god of the Red Mouse, and there was an inexplicable uneasiness growing on her that perhaps she might lose some day that necklace and all she had paid for it.

She looked up sharply as she entered her own boudoir, where none of her visitors ever set foot but on her invitation. A man sat comfortably stretched out in her own chair, the smoke from his cigarette circling up to the shaded lamp on the table by his elbow.

"Lesard!" she stopped short. "What on earth are you doing here? Why did you come to this room instead of the drawing-room?"

But his unlooked-for presence had reassured instead of displeasing her. If there had been anything wrong about those black diamonds she fancied she knew her man well enough to be certain he would have kept out of her way instead of seeking her.

"Why shouldn't I come here?" he lifted his lean, dark face and laughed. "I often do. And you know I never play in your menagerie and never add to your exchequer with"—he laughed again—"my widower's mite!"

"I don't want you. I'm dead tired." She was gazing at him curiously. How handsome he was—and what a devil!

"You tired!" his eyes flashed with amusement. "Get me a better reason, and I'll go home."

"You needn't go for a minute," she spoke thoughtfully, and with her back to him as she touched a bell. "You can go to bed, both of you," she said as her head maid appeared. "I will undress myself. Bring me my bouillon here, and——" she had been about to say whiskey and soda, when she saw it was already in the room. Lesard had made himself at home, then, while he waited! What could he want?

"You look very handsome tonight," he said languidly, when the maid had gone. He fixed his eyes on the Red Mouse as she sat opposite him tinkling a gold spoon against the thin china of the cup that held her bouillon. "Those things would make any other woman look overloaded, but they suit you. I wish you wouldn't wear so much rouge—you don't need it, and it's not—artistic!" with a shrug.

"You didn't come here to talk of my complexion," sharply, "or to pay me doubtful compliments!"

"No, nor real ones," he returned calmly. "You know I never make love to you. That is why we have been allies."

Something in his glance brought back the odd idea that had been haunting her all the evening; odd, indeed, for she had no inkling that Lesard was anything but what he seemed—a bird of passage, gay, reckless, untrustworthy; here today and gone tomorrow.

She put her cup down softly on the table nearest her, and with both hands behind the nape of her lovely neck unfastened the strange necklace for which she had given so much. She laid it slowly, carefully, on her lap, and sat looking at it. On her white satin gown it shone more fiercely than ever, dazzling her eyes. She remembered the day she had first seen it, flashing from blood-red fire to azure, paling to green and sulfur sparks, black and dead every now and then only for the crystalline, starry centers of the great stones, where stayed a luster almost unbearable.

Very evil, very wicked for all their glory, those stones had shone, till the Red Mouse coveted them as she had never coveted anything in the world. Lesard had laughed when she begged for them, and put them back into his pocket.

"Only money will get those!" he said; and money had got them only that day. They had been collected for a wicked woman, they belonged to a wicked woman now; but to one whose perceptions had been blunted by the dissipation which she watched and used to her own ends, but never shared. The Red Mouse lived by her wits; next to her money, she relied on her intuition, which thus far had never failed her. Its familiar voice was loud in her ears now.

"Did you come about these?" she asked suddenly, and tapped the lovely, glowing things on her knee.

"I did," he returned. "Oh, I don't want them back again. You needn't clutch them."

"Where did you get them?" she demanded, her hard, blue eyes watching each shadow on his face, for there were shadows there, as well as a covert exultation.

"Where?" Lesard blew a light ring of smoke far out into the room. "From a connection of—my wife's!" and the hidden truth of his words misled even her acuteness.

"Bah, you never had a wife! No woman on earth is rich enough to afford to marry you," she commented cynically. "And it is no concern of mine—unless you stole them."

The shaft struck home, but the man only laughed with a queer enjoyment.

"I got them in exchange—for a lot of other things," he averred lazily. "You own them now, when I'm paid."

"What do you mean? I paid you this afternoon."

"In part, my dear Mouse; only in part. These," he pulled two checks from his pocket, "were returned dishonored from the bank."

She glanced at them. It had taken a huge slice of her bank-account to pay Lesard. Rather than draw out all she needed, she had given him two checks drawn in her favor by a man whose money she borrowed with both hands. She remembered the checks perfectly—one was for two hundred pounds, one for five hundred—and drew in her breath sharply. A check dishonored meant to her an admirer to be cast off.

"Well," she cried angrily, "that is no concern of mine! I had nothing to do with it. It is you who are out that much, not I!"

"I am never out." His face darkened as he saw her lips set determinedly. "Give me that seven hundred in hard cash tonight and you keep the necklace. Otherwise"—he flicked the ash from his cigarette—"I am afraid it is you who will be left lamenting. I will have all my money, or——" he nodded significantly at the necklace till her fingers instinctively tightened their hold on it.

But she said nothing for a long moment, while she measured his strength with her eyes. If he dared he could do it, strong as she was. Well, he must not dare!

"You have had far more than the things are worth without that seven hundred," she said coolly. "I won't give you another penny."

"Unless I—make you!" his head flung back; he looked at her, a threatening devil in his half-closed eyes.

"You can't," she returned steadily, shifting her chair a little, "not while I have my foot on an electric bell!" with a sudden vicious energy. "You don't dare make a scandal."

"There would be no scandal—that would concern you!" but the cold threat in his voice never troubled the woman who had fought her own battles all her life.

"Stop that rot!" she said contemptuously; "I believe these diamonds are far too well known to have any fuss about. You take what you've got, and be thankful, for you won't get any more from me; not while you sell me things that a little working girl in the streets knows the minute she looks at them. I believe you've been playing a low game on me, somehow, when a girl cries out at the very sight of my necklace that I got it from you."

The sullen threat left Lesard's eyes as a flame is extinguished. His hawk face seemed to grow thin and hard as steel under her eyes.

"A girl—what sort of girl?" he demanded. "And when?" And this time she knew there was no safety in defying him.

"A slip of a thing, pale, with big eyes—in the street at my door tonight. She was standing there as I got out of the carriage."

"She couldn't see through your cloak!"

"It was hanging off me. I felt too warm." For once Lesard made no answer.

He was back again in that cave at Hamilton Place, looking at that hidden receptacle that was half-empty instead of full. Marchmont had said he had not got the belt—and now the man who had stabbed him knew it was true. He had known, in truth, since he had read that evening's papers, and cursed softly in the reading, though he laughed, too. But now he knew something more than that. Marchmont and he had quarreled for nothing. It was for nothing that he had done what might yet bring him to the gallows. For, of course, it was Gillian who had taken those jewels that had been so easily carried off from Wellford House, Gillian who had been mad enough to restore them to the police. Gillian who had left that damning trace of her presence in the cave and might yet pay the penalty for her husband's work.

But would she? It was not a feeling of security that made him breathe with narrowed nostrils, sitting opposite to the Mouse and her ill-gotten gewgaw.

He sucked thoughtfully at his lower lip, forgetful for once that the woman opposite was keen-eyed as he.

Gillian Hamilton to have taken that canvas belt might have been in the cave at any time. To know that Lesard had those black diamonds she must have seen Marchmont die—and where was his safety then?

He felt certain as if he had seen her that it had been Gillian at the Red Mouse's door, for, of course, she was in London. She knew no other place to go.

"Well," said the Mouse, tired of [illegible] "who was the girl? You must know."

He nodded, wishing he did not know. [illegible] fate that had sent her to see those diamonds he had thought it such a piece of luck to [illegible] might even now be leading the hounds of [illegible] on his track. Unless—he pulled himself together and met the Mouse's eyes with his confident smile. For the only person he had fear was the girl who had loved him to [illegible] Manlike, he was sure that she did so still—getting that even a woman will not always everything a man puts on her.

He had married her for a passing [illegible] thrown her aside for pure weariness; kept [illegible] fully out of her sight at Hamilton Place [illegible] Marchmont had unfolded "Tom Hamilton's scheme" and his adoption of the daughter he never dreamed had been Lesard's wife. Many a night before Jacky came to Hamilton Place had Lesard sat there, playing cards or laughing to himself as he thought of the [illegible] up-stairs and how little Marchmont knew [illegible] why she had been willing to find a home in his house. She had been a toy to Lesard. He would have cursed his own stupidity if he had known how easily love of him would have fashioned her into a tool for his own ends. Unconsciously, she had helped Marchmont; unconsciously, she would have made us really begot fortune for Lesard. But even now when he feared her, that was the only thought that did not occur to him.

"What on earth are you mooning about?" the strident voice with the hoarse thread in it shattered his musing for the second time. "How did that street girl know those diamonds and why did she gasp at the sight of them? If you came by them in any way that's going to get me into trouble you can take [illegible] this minute and return me my money."

Lesard threw back his head and laughed with keen enjoyment. The low, rich note of it was the richer for the thought of how completely he had taken in the sharpest adventuress in London. If she only knew!

"By George! you do say outrageous things," he cried, in the middle of his laughter. "That girl had excellent reason to know those diamonds. She's my wife! She must have seen me coming here lately and hung around your door in hopes of catching me. No wonder she gasped when she saw you wearing that necklace."

Not a word of not having seen his wife for months escaped him. It was a godsend to make the Mouse think jealousy had brought Gillian to her door, not the pure chance the man was old enough to know it for. But that lost seven hundred was a cheap price to pay for the knowledge that any living being had seen him take the black necklace. Forewarned was forearmed, and Lesard would run no chances. Those dishonored checks had been a stroke of luck, indeed, for nothing else would have brought him back to the Red Mouse after she had been fool enough to buy his bauble. But nothing was farther from his thought than to show them.

"Keep calm, my dear," he said leeringly. "Your complexion won't stand the strain if you keep permanently to evil imaginings. Pay me up, now, and I'll go home."

"I haven't got seven hundred between my fingers," relieved, yet sulky. "I wouldn't give it to you if I had."

"You'll give me all you got tonight!" He was suddenly her master, standing lean, fit, and brutal at her shoulder. "Hand it out of your pocket, or I'll take it and the necklace, too. What the devil do you think I care for your servants, if you do ring? Give me the money!"

Sullen, furious, cowed in spite of herself, the woman drew out a roll of notes, a handful of gold.

Lesard smiled wickedly as his hard hand closed on it. He could be gentler than silk to a woman while he loved her, but this was cold business.

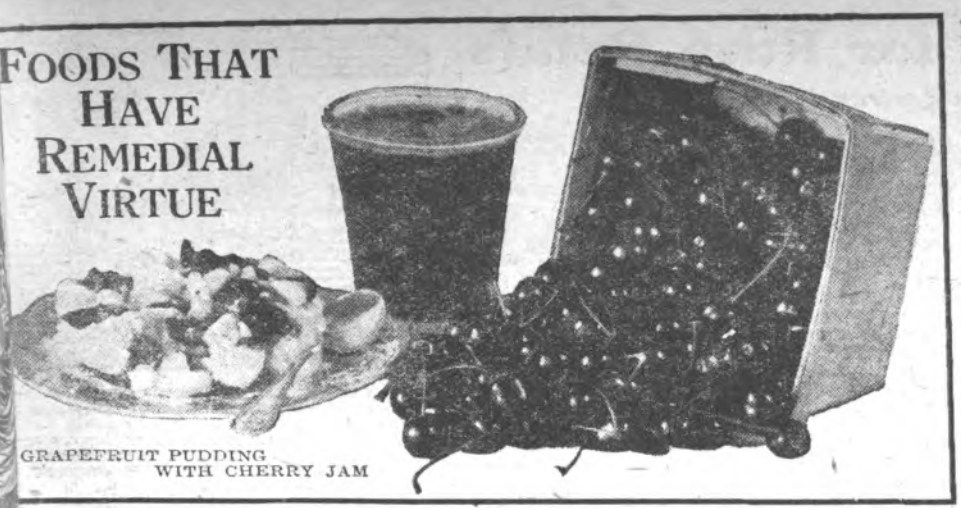
"Ta, ta!" he remarked gaily, "and consider yourself well out of it."

"You devil!" said the Red Mouse slowly. "If I find you've made me pay my money for nothing, you can look out for yourself."

But he only laughed again as he went lightly from the room.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"IN THE DEPTHS OF NIGHT."



With feet that scarcely felt the dirty pavement Jacky Hamilton walked swiftly away from that house to whose owner Lesard had sold the black diamonds.

He was in London! He was all ready to profit by the helpless witnesses of his crime.

"He sha'n't, he sha'n't!" the girl panted, as she walked. "Not if I go to the police tomorrow—not if Gillian goes on her knees to save him!"

Assisting Nature Through Right Eating

THE great majority of sufferers from constipation can find relief through right eating if each will study carefully his or her own case.

There are cases where constipation caused by some organic trouble, but in neral it is due to a low nervous state and reless eating and drinking. It takes patience overcome what has often reached a chronic age, but unless it is early conquered, other gans will be injuriously affected and the neral health will be impaired.

As a rule drugs afford but temporary relief chronic constipation and in time become effective even in increased doses; hence the sirability of regulating the bowels in the tural way, by a diet which tends to effect permanent cure. For this purpose the undation of a day's food should be coarse, tire wheat or brown bread, cereals, whole ilk, roots and leaves. and fruits in season.

offee and tea are nstipating and parcularly so if they ve stood on the ounds over four inutes. Tea that steeps" is extremely jurious because of e large content of nnin t us extracted om the leaves.

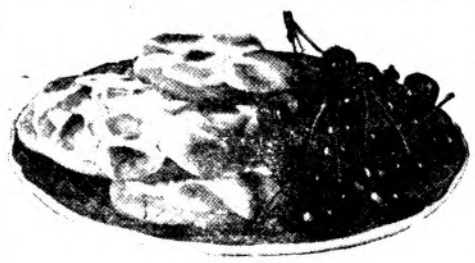
If you use a metal apot. throw it away d make your tea in n earthen one or in pitcher, pouring fresh oiling water over the aves, and at once placing it on the table to draw" the four minutes.

This season of the year is the heyday for gulating the diet to bodily needs. There e many who do not suffer from constipation, ut do from rheumatism, sluggish liver, sour d weak stomach, all of which are greatly lieved through healthful eating. Meat and sh, while entirely wholesome, should be aten sparingly in the above mentioned conitions, and during the months of fresh fruits d vegetables not at all. Other foods to be voided by people having such tendencies are veets and pastries, while eggs should not e eaten more frequently than twice a week.

As habit plays an important part in the igestive function, a glass of water should be aken one hour before meals, an hour and a alf after meals, and before retiring at night. little lemon or fresh lime juice taken in the ater cures many a headache caused by a luggish liver. The watery fruits such as ranges, grapefruit, melons, plums, peaches, ears and rapes will act irectly on the iver and bowls if eaten as ong as possible before breakfast, beween meals and before going to bed.

As all vegetables contain in varied proportions the mineral elements requisite to health, they are of great value in our meals, being especially important in the building of bone, teeth, other tissues and blood. Stews made of fresh vegetables should be eaten frequently because cook d in this way, there is no loss of mineral constituents, as there is when the vegetables are boiled and the water thrown away. With a little planning, much of these valuable vegetable juices may be used in soups, chowders and gravies, and at the same time a very pleasing flavor obtained.

With plenty of fruit eaten at proper times, milk and whole wheat bread eaten together and slowly for two meals out of the three, have alone relieved cases of nervous indigestion and constipation. Milk should never be drunk as a beverage with other foods, excepting bread. Only a strong digestion can take care of a glass of milk rapidly drunk.



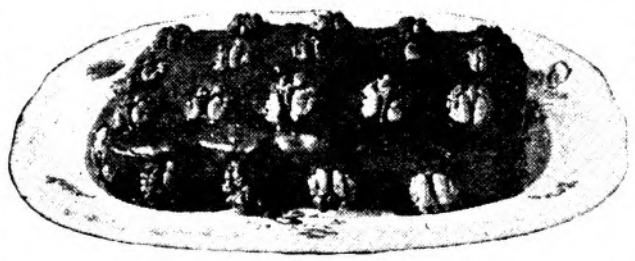
It is essential to health that the blood contain a certain percentage of iron, and as this vital element is continually being used and eliminated, its loss must be continually supplied. Health languishes as iron in the blood falls below normal, and so will constipation increase. Lacking sufficient iron the rosy child becomes pale. The vegetables which contain the largest amount of iron are spinach, lettuce, carrots, corn, potatoes, turnips and peanuts, dried beans and peas.

The new potatoes should be scrubbed clean, roasted and eaten with cream or butter without peeling. Spinach, turnip and beet tops, asparagus, and other watery vegetables should be steam cooked in as little water as possible.

Cherries in Season

The months of June and July are the cherry season throughout the country. Everybody enjoys canned cherries, but it is not so generally understood that drying offers a simple and economical method for preserving cherries when canning is inconvenient. Sweet cherries of the solid-fleshed varieties may be employed for the same purposes as raisins. Canned cherries make a delicious and appetizing pie in winter, and for tarts and cake fillings the cherry jam is unexcelled. Fresh cherries may be eaten freely, providing they are not taken with milk and starchy foods. All cherries contain a tonic element. The wild choke-cherry is unwholesome because of its high content of tannin.

CANNED CHERRIES.—Stew and remove pits. If a cherry stoner cannot be obtained, a little practice with an ordinary hairpin, held by the open end while the loop end is inserted at the point of the attachment of the stem and used to pull out the pit, will enable the work to be done quickly and with minimum injury to the appearance of the fruit. Try to save the lost juice by having everything clean. Many do not object to the flavor of the stones, but if they are not removed the amount of sugar should be increased. Where a slight amount of cherry bitter is desired, a few of the stones may be put into the bottom of each jar.



MARGUERITES.

Fill sterilized jars with fruit, and then to overflowing with a hot syrup made by boiling three parts sugar and two parts water for ten minutes. Adjust sterilized rubbers and tops, practically tighten covers, and set in a boiler with hot water coming about three-fourths way up the side of jars. After the water begins to boil, cook sixteen minutes, remove from water, seal and set in a cool dry place after the fruit is cold.

CHERRY JAM.—Pit and weigh fruit. Use two parts sugar to three parts cherries. Put together in a porcelain-lined kettle and cook uncovered until the right consistency is obtained. For added bitter, tie most of the stones in cheese-cloth, cook with the fruit and then remove. Fill jars and when cool, cover with a half-inch of hot paraffin. Keep dry and cool.

DRIED CHERRIES.—The fruit should be thoroughly ripened on the tree. Remove any cherries that show imperfections. Small or medium-sized cherries may be dried without pitting. Sun-dried fruit is the best, and should each day be taken indoors before the sun is too low, or any dampness is observed. Spread in a single layer in the trays and start the drying with the dryer at a temperature not greater than 120 degrees, raising it cautiously to 145 or 150 degrees as the fruit approaches dryness. Properly dried cherries have an elastic "rubbery" feel, and it is impossible to press any juice out of the stone cavity when the fruit is squeezed between the fingers.

LILY CAKE WITH CARAMEL SAUCE.

Use a good-sized box, lined with paper and provided with a muslin cover to keep out insects, as a temporary receptacle for the fruit while it is being aftercured or conditioned. As new lots are added to the box, stir the whole, and continue the stirring at intervals of a day or two for two weeks after the last batch is added. When the fruit is to be put into permanent containers, return it to the drier, spreading it rather deeply on the trays; and heat up to 180 degrees for two or three minutes, or place in baking tins in the oven of the range, to destroy any eggs of fruit-destroying insects which may be present.

CHERRY PIE.—Fill a deep plate with pitted cherries. Mix one cup of sugar, two tablespoons of flour and one-eighth teaspoon of salt and pour it over the cherries. Add one tablespoon of butter cut into bits. After lining the plate with pastry, sprinkle with flour before putting in the fruit. The top is covered with lattice crust. Bake in a moderate oven until the crust is crisp and brown.

CUCUMBER AND TOMATO SALAD.

CHERRY SURPRISES.—Line round gem tins with good pastry and sprinkle with flour. Cut one cup of cherries into small pieces, add one-half cup of sugar, and the beaten yolks of two eggs. Stir and pour into the pastry. Bake in moderate oven. When done top with the egg whites beaten stiff and dry and mixed with two tablespoons of sugar. Brown in oven.

CHERRY JUICE.—Break and mash unpitted cherries, cover with cold water and cook as for jelly. Strain. To each measure of juice add three-fourths as much sugar. Cook twenty minutes and seal in sterilized jars. To use as a beverage, dilute with ice water and add lemon and orange juice.

CHERRY CONSERVE.—Two quarts of sour pitted cherries, one pint of fresh chopped pineapple, one quart of chopped apple and seven cups of sugar. Cook all together until thick and clear, turn into jelly glasses and cover with paraffin when cold.

Dishes You Will Like

CREAM OF LETTUCE SOUP.—Shred two good-sized heads of lettuce. Slowly brown one thin slice of onion in two tablespoons of butter, chopping it as it cooks. Add lettuce, one quart of white stock, and three tablespoons of washed rice. Cook until the rice is soft. Beat the yolk of one egg, add one-third cup of heavy cream, a little salt and paprika and stir it into the soup. Cook one minute, adding more seasoning to taste. A little chopped parsley is liked by many.

STUFFED STEAK WITH NEW TURNIP.—Mix one and one-half cup of boiled rice with two tablespoons of minced onion, one-half cup of new chopped carrot, four tablespoons of melted butter, two-thirds teaspoon of salt and a little pepper. Pound steak, at the same time working a little dry flour into it. Spread with the above mixture, roll and tie, and place in a deep baking dish with about one cup of water. Cover closely and bake three hours in a very slow oven. After two hours, sprinkle lightly with salt and add a little more water if necessary to make the required amount of gravy. If the steak has plenty of water for steam, it is better to add more after the meat is done. Pare new white turnips, put into a steamer over boiling water and cook until soft.

SWEET POTATOES.—To bake, place the well-scrubbed potatoes in a moderate oven, cook until soft when pierced with a fork, and then half an hour longer that the potato may be creamy and fine flavored. If the skin turns dark and thick, it is because the oven was too hot.

SOUTHERN SWEET POTATOES.—Pare and cut potatoes lengthwise into slices about one inch thick. To three tablespoons of butter add two tablespoons of sugar and melt together in a frying pan. In this lightly brown the potatoes, sprinkle with salt and pepper, and add boiling water to cover the bottom of the pan. Cover closely and set back where the potatoes will slowly cook until done. Turn the potatoes occasionally. They should be a rich brown when done. Many like pork fat in place of butter.

BAKED ASPARAGUS OMELET.—One cup of cooked asparagus cut up fine. In a saucepan melt two tablespoons of butter and add one even tablespoon of dry flour, smooth and gradually add one cup of hot milk. Cook slowly while stirring until creamy, add the asparagus and four lightly beaten eggs. Stir well together, pour into a well-buttered omelet pan and as soon as it lightly browns on the bottom set in a moderate oven to finish cooking. Cut down through the center, fold over and turn onto hot platter.

CUCUMBER AND TOMATO SALAD.—Quite the most attractive way to serve this salad is pictured on this page. Peel the cucumber and soak whole in cold water until crisp. Cut into thin slices, holding the cucumber so it will not fall apart. Arrange a bed of lettuce leaves, lay the cucumber in the center with sliced tomatoes at each end. Just before serving pour over a dressing made as follows: Mix one-third cup of salad oil with three tablespoons of lemon juice, one teaspoon of scraped onion, one-third teaspoon of powdered sugar, one tablespoon of finely chopped parsley, four tiny red peppers, or a mixture of cayenne and paprika, and one scant teaspoon of salt. Let stand two hours and then beat before using.

PRUNE WHIP.—Steam one cup of prunes that have been washed and soaked one hour in cold water. When they have fully puffed and are soft when pierced with a toothpick they are done. Cool, remove the skins and seeds and mash fine. Beat three egg whites until very stiff, gradually add one-half cup of sugar and then fold in the mashed prunes and two tablespoons of lemon juice. Serve at once with sponge cakes.

GRAPEFRUIT PUDDING.—Soften two tablespoons of gelatine in one-fourth cup of cold water, add one cup of boiling water and one and one-fourth cup of sugar, stirring until dissolved. Add one-half cup of grapefruit juice and one-third cup of orange juice, and set away to slightly stiffen, then beat in the whites of two eggs that have been beaten until stiff and dry. The mixture should be white and creamy. Turn into moulds and set in a cool place to stiffen. Serve with a sauce made as follows: Bring two cups of milk to scald in a double boiler. Beat the yolks of the two eggs until light colored, add three tablespoons of sugar mixed with one teaspoon of corn-starch, beat and pour the hot milk into the eggs, stir and return to boiler. Cook and continue stirring until the custard thickens. Do not overcook. The custard will continue thickening as it cools. Just before serving flavor with either vanilla, crushed banana, or mashed strawberries. For variety lightly break the pudding and combine with cherry jam.

LILY CAKE WITH CARAMEL FROSTING.—Cream one-half cup of butter and gradually add one cup of sugar. Beat in one-fourth cup of flour. Sift together three times one-half cup of corn-starch, three-fourths cup of flour and two teaspoons of baking powder, and add this alternately to the butter mixture with one-half cup of milk and one teaspoon of vanilla. Beat until smooth, then fold in the whites of six eggs beaten stiff and dry. Bake in a slow oven.

FROSTING.—Boil three-fourths cup of thin cream with one-third tablespoon of butter and one and one-half cup of brown sugar until a little dropped in cold water can be formed into a ball. Beat until thick enough to spread. Decorate with half walnut meats.

MARGUERITES.—Boil three-fourths cup of sugar with one-fourth cup of water until it threads. Add four marshmallows cut into pieces and pour them slowly over the stiffly beaten white of one egg, and add one-third cup of chopped nut meats and a very little flavoring. Spread on milk crackers and lightly brown.

Delightful Uses for Rose Petals

By Nelle Rortrey

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

EVERY one loves the scent of roses and for years the rose petals from many a beautiful California lawn have been a source of profit to the owners, who made them into dainty beads, for which we women of the middle west pay exorbitant prices, thinking it is impossible to make them for ourselves. Every year, during late May and early June, our lawn in the Ozarks was a mass of delicately scented color. I had dozens of times lamented the fact the bushels of rose petals were going to waste, but it never occurred to me that I might utilize them for the purpose of making some of the beautiful flower beads for which my soul yearned. Then one day a California cousin wrote me a letter, and in it she mentioned the fact that she had finished half-a-dozen strands of rosebeads that week. "For my gift box," she said; and for a while I occupied my time wishing that I might be one to be remembered with such a gift. And then I thought of my own petals going to waste, and I immediately sat down to write a "hurry-up letter" to my cousin asking for the directions for making a strand of the delicately perfumed neck-wear.

I shall copy the reply to that letter as she perhaps made the directions plainer than I could.

"You need not think that just because you have only half-a-dozen rose bushes, it is impossible to save enough petals for a strand of beads. A couple of bushes that bloom profusely will furnish enough blooms to be worth while saving.

Gather the petals in the early morning, and pick only those that would drop or wilt before another morning. Spread them out on a cloth to dry. A sunny upstairs bedroom is ideal for this. Keep them well stirred or they will mould. It is not necessary to keep the different colors separate, for they will all be the same dull black when they are done.

"After you have about half a bushel of petals saved you are ready to start your beads. Run them through the food grinder and pour all the oil that runs out, back on the petals. Run them through at least three times, using the finest blade. After they are ground, put them in an iron pot or skillet and leave them in a cool place over night. It is this leaving in the black iron that gives them the desirable black tint. Repeat the grinding process every day for eight days. By this time they will be a soft smooth dough; and then they are ready to be made into beads. To each half cup of dough, add five drops of oil of roses. Mix this in thoroughly and begin moulding the beads. Pinch off a small portion of the mass and roll till round, between the palms of the hands. If you have never had practice at this sort of work, you had best put the first few back, and do them over, as they will not be apt to be of uniform size.

"When they are moulded to your satisfaction, run them on a hatpin or fine knitting needle. With the rounding end of a fine wire hairpin, make fine indentations over the surface of each bead while still moist. This gives them the Oriental appearance that is so much admired.

"After they are perfectly dry, rub them with vaseline or olive oil. And then they are ready to be strung. They are most attractive when strung between dull, old gold beads—preferably two gold ones between each pair of black ones."

I made the beads according to her directions, and though that was three years ago, they are still things of beauty, and the delicate odor has never left them.

The same year I saved enough petals for a rose jar. These were very popular in our mother's day, and are just as desirable now as then. The containers may be bought at any department store, and many of them are indeed things of beauty. But any sort of a jar will do, providing it has a tight lid.

Pick the petals every morning and on top of each picking, drop three drops of attar of roses. Shake well and replace the cover. After the jar is full, empty them out onto a platter and add a teaspoonful each of cinnamon and ground cloves, six drops each of oil of lavender and rosemary and an ounce of orris root. Mix all together well, and pack the leaves back into the jar. About once a month turn the jar upside down and leave so over night.

This mixture will last for years without losing its fragrance. Never leave the jar open for more than a few minutes at a time. That will be sufficient to scent the whole room for all day.

Brownie's Triumph

apparently the self-sacrificing and loving mother.

All her hopes now centered in him, and she bent all her energies toward carving out a brilliant future for him. And yet there were times when she seemed so troubled and melancholy that for days, and even weeks, she would be unlike herself, and as if brooding over some hidden grief or sin.

She had long since banished the memories of those deeds of her early life.

They were not pleasant to recall.

But tonight those homely old proverbs, "Chickens always come home to roost," "You'll get your pay," as uttered by Lady Ruxley, seemed to possess a strange significance and sounded like uncanny prophecies in her ears.

CHAPTER XXII.

A LEAP FOR LIFE.

Adrian Dredmond was indeed the grandson and heir of Lord Dunforth, the former lover of Miss Mehetabel Douglas.

He had married, as she told Brownie, five years after the terrible disappointment which had well-nigh ruined both their lives.

His wife was a sweet-tempered, gentle little body, and she loved him with her whole heart.

He liked her well enough, and respected her thoroughly, but the one love of his life had been that proud, fair-haired girl who had broken his heart. It had been a deathless love, as could easily be seen by his rambling talk the night he met Isabel at Lady Pease-well's.

When he finally married he had done so to please his father, and in order to perpetuate the name.

But another disappointment awaited him, for only a daughter blessed their union, and there was no heir to take the title. At the age of sixteen she fell in love with a colonel in the English army—a widower nearly twice her age.

Her father, whose life had been such a failure, would not doom her to a like fate, and so consented to the marriage, although he did not fully approve of it, both on account of his daughter's youth and the profession of Colonel Dredmond, since, in all probability, it would eventually separate him from his only child.

But the fair young girl bride only lived one short year, and died soon after the birth of their only child—a fine boy, whom his father named Adrian.

Colonel Dredmond was soon after ordered into active service, and was killed fighting like the brave man he was.

Henceforth Adrian became his grandfather's sole joy and comfort, and he lavished upon him all the love which his bruised heart was capable of feeling.

The boy inherited all his father's bravery, together with his grandfather's honor and nobility of character, and bade fair to make the declining years of Lord and Lady Dunforth the best and happiest of their lives.

During the last few weeks he had been very unhappy and depressed.

His anxiety regarding Brownie, in whom he had at last acknowledged he had more than an ordinary interest, rendered him gloomy and absent-minded.

He did not enjoy company, it irritated and angered him to look around and see others so gay, when, perhaps, the one whom he now knew he loved more than his own life, was friendless and maybe suffering.

He had come down to Dunforth Castle to be present at the dinner party to please his grandmother, but he told her, upon his arrival, that he must return to London upon the next day, as he had important business which would not allow of his absence.

That business was his constant and almost hopeless search for Brownie Douglas. His meeting with Isabel tonight made his trouble seem more bitter than ever, and for the first time in his life he felt, as if he almost hated a human being.

He regretted exceedingly her engagement to Sir Charles, for he was warmly attached to the young man; but he felt that he was powerless to save him from what he feared his future would be with such a vain and selfish girl as he knew Miss Coolidge to be.

As soon as dinner was over, feeling weary and gloomy, he lighted a cigar, and went out by himself into the cool night air.

The sky was somewhat overcast, but not dark, for there was a full moon, which every now and then burst out gloriously from behind the clouds, and he could distinguish objects quite plainly.

About a quarter of a mile from the castle the ground arose very abruptly for a short distance, and suddenly terminated in a high precipice, which shelved out over a deep and swift-running river.

This was accounted a very dangerous spot by people in that vicinity, for the continual dropping and caving away of the rocks and earth had left the hill above but a mere shell or shelf, hanging out over the river a hundred feet below, and which, it was predicted, was liable to be precipitated into it at any moment, since an ugly seam had appeared about twenty feet from the brink, and the spot was shunned by every one, although it used to be much frequented on account of the lovely view which it commanded.

To any one unacquainted with the path which led up this ascent, it was like tempting Providence to try to reach the top, for there were pitfalls on every side, and the path was winding and uneven.

But Adrian knew every step of the ground, for during his boyhood he had explored every inch many a time, and he clambered on now, still thinking gloomily of his own affairs.

He had accomplished about two-thirds of the distance, and he could hear the restless surging of the river, as its waters rushed over its rocky bed, when the moon came sailing out from behind a white-edged cloud, and flooded the whole landscape with its yellow light.

He looked up and swept his eye over the hill. He started, and an exclamation of horror broke from him as he did so.

He had seen some one standing on the very edge of the dangerous precipice, and gazing down into the valley beyond.

It was a woman, and the breeze made her dark, flowing garments sweep out behind her in graceful folds, and now she lifted her head, and he could faintly distinguish the outline of her face as the moonlight fell upon it.

He dare not call out to her for fear the sound of his voice would startle her, and she would be precipitated into the boiling river below. For a moment the strength all went out of his body, as he thought he should never be able to reach and save her—that his extra weight upon that frail shelf must bring death to them both.

Then, without a second thought of self, he sprang forward with swift, noiseless steps.

Surely, whoever she was, she could not realize the horrible danger of that moment, and the young man's heart fairly ceased its beating, as with a few rapid strides he was at her side, and laying a firm hand upon her arm, he said, in tones thrilling with anxiety:

"Madam, do you know that you are tempting death? This portion of the hill is liable to cave at any moment."

Then, without releasing his strong hold of her, he drew her quickly back from the spot, farther and yet farther from the sound of those roaring waters, which seemed hungering for their prey, until they reached the fatal seam, which Adrian saw was now wider than ever before.

Just then a sudden shock seemed to strike him, then a rattling, rolling, horrible sound reached his ears, and a sensation of swaying and dizziness crept over him.

He knew what it meant—death!

Only one thought was in his heart now, and it rent his soul with its silent agony.

"Brownie, my Brownie, I shall never see you again!"

The next instant—he never knew how he did it—but he caught the form at his side in his arms, and sprang forward, all his strength and energies gathered into that leap for life.

Not an instant too soon, however, for the whole space which they had just traversed was swept from their sight as if by magic, and went crashing and tumbling down into the fearful depths below, leaving that noble man and trembling woman faint, dizzy, and with the thought of the horrible death which they had so narrowly escaped, and clinging wildly to each other in horrified silence.

Then, keeping his hold upon her to support her he led her still farther away from the yawning chasm, saying, gently:

"Sit down upon this rock under this tree for a few moments until you regain your strength."

She obeyed, and he bent down to look into her face.

"Are you faint? Shall I go for some water?" he asked; then suddenly dropping upon his knees before her he exclaimed:

"Just Heaven! is it you that I have saved from that? Oh! if I had not come!" came from him in a startled, almost anguished cry.

His voice shook like an old man's with horror, his face, as the moonlight struck it, was ashen in its hue, and for the moment he was more completely unnerved that the girl whom he had rescued from such imminent danger. Her hands lay white and limp in her lap.

He gathered them up in his strong clasp and pressed his lips again and again upon them, while his breast heaved with the fierce, frightened throbbings of his heart. Not only Heaven knew the horrible yet rapturous sensations of that moment, when he discovered that she whom he had just saved from a terrible death, was none other than Brownie Douglas whom he had given up in long sorrowing!

"Yes, it is I whom you have saved, Mr. Dredmond; but for you I should now be lying crushed, and bruised, and dead at the bottom of yonder stream," was the low reply, in those sweet tones, which he would have recognized at the ends of the earth.

"I little thought to find you here. I have searched something of your trouble, and I have searched everywhere for you in London, Miss Douglas, for the last two months, and it was with reluctance that I relinquished my quest long enough to obey a summons hither," he said, when he began to recover himself a little.

He did not stop to think that she might deem it singular that he, almost a stranger, should be searching so earnestly for her.

"How strange," he went on, "that I should have come hither to save you from even worse than what I feared might have happened to you? It was dreadful for you to be there, and my brain grows dizzy with the thought of what must have been if I had not come. Did you know of that perilous shelf? Has no one told you?"

"No, Mr. Dredmond, I only came to Dunforth Castle today. I was sad and lonely tonight, and being freed from my duties I came out for a stroll in the moonlight. I saw this hill, and heard the dashing of the stream, and thinking a delightful view might be obtained from the top, I clambered up. It was like being suddenly awakened from a beautiful dream, when you seized and bore me from the place."

Adrian shuddered.

"I expected that both of us would be dashed in pieces when I saw the earth giving way, and heard that dreadful noise," she added, in trembling tones.

"Better that, than that you should not have come at all," he returned, passionately.

His tone seemed to recall her suddenly to herself, and she tried to release her hands which he still held tightly clasped in his.

He was almost unconscious that he still held them, but at the effort she made he looked up at her and saw that her face had grown crimson with blushes, while her eyes dropped shyly beneath his gaze.

"I beg your pardon," he said, releasing them at once, and rising to his feet. "You will think me presuming, but my gratitude that you were safe made me forget myself. Did I understand you that you are staying at the castle?" he asked, changing the subject to relieve his embarrassment.

"I am there for a few days."

"Indeed! and so am I," he replied, much pleased, and forgetting that he had told his grandmother he could not possibly remain longer than over one night. "You are cold," he added, as he saw her shiver; "shall I take you back now to the castle?"

"Thank you; yes."

Then, with a tenderness which thrilled her through and through, yet with a courtly deference which made him seem more grand and noble than ever before, he supported her faltering steps down the steep path, and led her back to the castle.

UNE of all months shows the eternal vigor and youth of the eart . Those of us who have shivered in the northern states through an over-long winter now look upon a very different world from the -buried, icebound one of a hundred days Nature, with the perfection of her re- nt fulfillment, is a bulwark of all faith, all mism. The best of hopes, the surest of f, must be looked for in those who live in ral ways nearest to the natural world; and can blend with its changes as do the child, savage, and those who dwell upon the land draw nurture therefrom.

oo much of our social theorizing, too much ur law-making and governing, are being e today by men who look out upon the ld and their fellows with a disillusion, a imism, as dark and icebound as a New land February. They have no belief in world that man might make beautiful in aps a hundred years—as Nature has just e in a hundred days. When some of these smile, their lips move. That is all. And nothing was ever done without faith and usiasm. Even the trees of June clap r hands before a shower!

f course, the pessimism of the old is largely to the illusion of Time. Man, not having accomplished in his own short span all had hoped, feeling his slow relinquishment world he has not seen molded to his heart's re, comes to believe no change possible and ws hope into the discard. To such the ld becomes all February—with the prob- ities of a bad March! And it is hard n men thinking in these ways influence govern a world in which youth is to live where it comes hopefully trooping.

hen there is the other and darker pessimism n is bred of life in large cities and under the ky shadow and clanking sound of our hined industrialism. I believe it not an ggeration to say that no sane thinking— king with life, hope and heart in it—is pos- e where industry has free play with its ormal blight. Man's heart and brain were de many centuries before steel and coal l oil were kings of thought and action. es fine and innate parts of man do not ction best to the beat of a maching nor risa on the breath of bitumen and petro- m.

And yet it is chiefly from such thinking and uences as I have shortly paragraphed that tendencies of government arise today. cause I believe this, I have come to turn my n hopes of the world's and our country's ure two ways: to youth, whose faith is sh with enthusiasm and green with the sap life; and to the dwellers upon the land who , when they choose, see clearly through and ove our present mass of laws and law-makers. this connection, too, it is interesting to con- er that our agricultural population suffers lay the burden of many strange statutes— st of which have come into being to deal th conditions city born and bred.

In any man or men who are facing the world nstructively, who wish to act on behalf of eir fellows, convictions and independence of ought are needed first of all. This indepen- nce, these convictions, can develop on the nd (they have always developed there), but ver can they come strong and finely sane om servants of machine and organization, oken atoms of our modern industrial living. In our cities wealth and power grow as fast the power of machinery and organization ve grown. There these really ephemeral ths are worshiped as never before. Again r a time it is forgotten that aloof and sh Nature stands above and beyond all stitutions of organizing, machine-tending an,—her government ancient and immutable nd all the scratches of man's civilization upon r but passing scars. And forgetting this, e worship and service of science-aided wealth nd industry becomes a faith to replace older impler beliefs which might have proved hecks to modern tendencies. Our great city hurches, even, grow to be centers of power, iches and organization, but not, I think, enters of a richness of faith, a power of the pirit, an organizing for true brotherhood. The reason for these things is simply that all spects of civilization, all forms of social action, esult as a product mirroring our means of pro- uctive life—of which they are the growth. t is the old story of the figs and thistles.

From age, from discouraged experiences of ife, from our machine-made products of our machine-molded world, spring the thought that finds reflection in world government to- lay. The instinctive tendency is with check and counter-check to hold our over-organized life closer within the bounds of organization— the very system and tendency the Germans followed to a given end. Only here and there is a little tinge of faith or constructive action. I would like to have clipped from the metro- politan press the numerous allusions made to "the next war." Is it for this our youth is to make ready and our old men plan? I think not. There is a June as well as a February.

The truth is that our modern world is really the victim of machines which have formed conditions that are tearing out the best of our life. We are liable to die by dynamo with science feeling our pulse and prescribing nar- cotics to the last. Modern industrialism is coming to represent for man a separation from God, Nature and that true Art which is a man- ifestation of a love for, and a belief in, Nature and God. Our hope must be in youth, not yet a slave to machine, organization or estab- lished modes of thought, and in the land- dweller, who can be practically free from the evil influences and abnormal results of our overwrought civilization and its effect upon thought and life. From these faiths and sani- ties our help must come.

All civilization is a top-heavy growth, be- ginning from the land and supported from this base. It is from the earth-centered roots that the leaves of our plant of civilized government draw nourishment. Let us remember this when we look upon the green leaves of the young summer. Not Birmingham, not Pitts- burgh, not New York, Chicago, St. Louis or Sa Francisco are our country. No, thank God and June!

And now for the letters:

HOWARD, COLORADO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Billy must have eaten my first letter, as it did not make its appearance in COMFORT. Before I go any further I will tell you what I look like: I am six feet and three-quarters of an inch tall. I have brown eyes, brown hair, and I weigh be- tween 115 and 125 pounds. You can see from this description that I am not very fat. I was seventeen years old last September.

I live on a ranch of 122 acres. Our ranch is located in Pleasant Valley. The chief crops we raise here are alfalfa, potatoes, and a little corn. There are not any watermelons grown here be- cause the season is too short. Colorado's water- melons are grown in the eastern part of the state. Some melons are grown at Canon City, about fifty miles from us. We grow a good many apples in this part of the state, also quite a few cherries and plums. Corn does not do very well here because the nights are too cool.

We are about 7,000 feet above sea level, and we can see mountains from our place that are more than 13,000 feet high. When it comes to scenery, Colorado can't be beat. The average number of clear days we have in a year are about 320. An- other advantage of living in Colorado is that we have cool nights in the summer. The coldest it got here during the past winter was 18 below zero.

I agree with Cousin Augustus Trick about the powder and rouge, but I believe that if the girls are determined to use 'em, let them do as they please and keep on to their heart's content. But I do know that a girl looks horrible when she uses too much powder and rouge. Uncle, I agree with you on this bobbed-hair question. Of course we boys are not angels by any means. We have our faults the same as the girls.

Uncle, I will try to tell you what a chinquapin is. It is a small acorn. Ask Billy, he can tell you what chinquapins are, for goats like chinquapins pretty well. In case you don't know what an acorn is, I will get you some samples and send them to you.

There are four in our family. I have one sister. I am not a cowboy, as most of you will think, per- haps. I can ride in a big wagon without falling out, but there must be sideboards on it then. So you see I am not much of a broncho buster.

Well, I had better quit for this time. Won't the cousins please write to me? I will answer every letter.

Your new cousin,
RAYMOND WINTERS.

P. S. Gus, if you come through Howard on your Grand Tour, stop long enough and I will play you a game of horseshoes. Uncle, did you ever play horseshoes?

Thanks for the information about the chin- quapins, Raymond. I have filed this away in my two-legged portable encyclopedia. Of course Billy could have told me what ch nquapins were. He knows everything. The trouble is the way he tells you. That's why I pref- fer to look to the Family or elsewhere to have my ignorance remedied, rather than to be too tartly reminded of my lacking mentality by a whisker-filtered vocabulary on stilts (I hope he reads this!)

Raymond, you want to know if I ever play horseshoes. Now I don't want to brag, Ray, but it is only justice and truth to declare that the only reason that youngster out in Iowa is pro- claimed champion is because he never met me. I can fling horseshoes with the regularity and accuracy of a six-cylinder cash register count- ing up ice-cream sodas on a July day. I once made three ringers in one game. My horse- shoe moves through the air in a perfect arc and descends to nestle flatly and permanently closer to the stake than that of any other shoe shooter. Did I ever play horseshoes, Ray- mond? That's one sport I don't do anything better. If I had my deserts, I would have awarded to me a solid gold horseshoe with dia- mond nail heads three-eighths of an inch a- cross. I would be regarded and photographed and movied as the International Champ- pion of the Twin Stakes. No six-footed, lone- winged Coloradian could make three points against me in six games—not after I got my collar off and my coat laid away under a handy maple tree. Did I ever play horse- shoes, Raymond? Ask me again!

BOX 476 HARVARD NEBRASKA.

DEAR UNCLE LISRA AND COUSINS:

I have been a silent reader of your paper for several years, so now will try my luck in making friends with Billy. I am so anxious to see my let- ter in print. I have never seen any letters from Nebraska in COMFORT yet—is it that the cousins don't write, or that you don't like us Nebraskans, Uncle?

I have read where so many cousins tell in COM- FORT of their beautiful scenery of falls, mountains, etc. We have nothing like that here; everythin is level ground and all the country is well-populated I wish I could write as good letters as many of the cousins do, but maybe some day when I get to be an old grandma I will be able to!

In July or August I am going to tour some of the western states. I will travel through Wyoming, Idaho and California. I will stay in Sandpoint, Idaho, for a month or more, so if any of the cousins live there I will be delighted to see them. If any of the cousins dwell in Rohnerville, Reedley, Los Angeles and San Francisco, California, I would be also pleased to hear from them, for no doubt I will visit these towns.

I am a very lonely girl, so I hope the cousins will write and also favor me with snapshots of them- selves, for I want to start a COMFORT Album.

I suppose you are wondering what I look like; I am very jolly (only not now, for I am down with the flu!), and I have medium brown hair, not bob- bed. I have blue-gray eyes, a fair complexion, a few freckles, very even teeth, and I am five feet, three inches tall. I weigh 110 pounds. That's nuff 'bout that.

Let us all give three cheers for Uncle Lisha and the wonderful work he is doing! I hope all the cousins will write. I'll answer as many as I can.

Your loving niece and cousin,
ANNA L. NEWFIELD.

Anna, I think it is true that the Nebraska cousins are not numerous as letter writers—at least they are no such prolific penpushers as the proud Missourians and the talented Texans. Bill once lived for three days on the output of one Texas county. But you must not think I don't like the Nebraska branch of the Family, Anna. I love 'em all just as I do you!

You'll surely meet a lot of the Big Bunch on your western tour. You will come back with your list of relatives extended by many miles and faces. After your return you must write to let me know just how widespread you found our Family tree in the states of Wyoming, Idaho and California. We have a nice little crowd of cousins in Los Angeles county, Anna, as you may find when you get in that movie territory. Take along a camera and make your own album as you go. I wish I might be sitting in the rear seat with you and keeping track on an adding machine of the cousins we pass!

OKATUPPA, ALABAMA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I do hope that Billy don't get this letter. He got one of mine, but I was glad of it for it was so silly. I enjoy reading COMFORT—the stories are so interesting, and oh, how I do enjoy reading the cousins' letters and your wise comments on them. I like to read letters where the cousins describe their homes and farms.

I live on a farm of about fifty acres. That is, there are about that many in cultivation. Papa owns three hundred acres of land. We have one horse, one mule, a small bunch of cattle, a nice bunch of hogs (I have three to sell), and the finest of all, a big bunch of goats. This is a fine country for goats at all times of the year. In the summer they can eat oak leaves and in the winter they eat acorns. After you get this letter in print, Uncle, ask Billy if he wants to come down here and eat leaves and acorns. Uncle Lisha, is he as bad to eat salt as our goats, do you suppose?

We rent out a lot of our swamp land. The rent- ers make some fine corn crops too.

If any of you cousins, and Uncle Lisha, too, get too hot next summer, come down and we will go in swimming. There is a creek right behind our field and I have some fun in it with the other boys.

I am going to describe myself: I am a boy nearly sixteen years old. I have light brown hair, hazel eyes, and a sun-tanned face. I weigh about 140 pounds and am five and one-half feet tall. I am in the eighth grade at school and have to walk over two miles to get there. We play basket ball at school, and surely do have a good time playing it, too.

If you print this, Uncle Lisha, I will send you one of my pictures—if you want the ugly thing.

All of you cousins write to me—girls, too—and I will try and answer all that I can.

Your nephew,
JAMES A. BELL, JR.

Jim, it is getting near to swimming-hole time now, and you can expect to see me 'most any day. We'll cut 'cross lots for the creek double quick. I'll show you my new alligator dive and my belly whopper back flip. I'm some diver, James, and no matter how deep the bot- tom, I can always bring up a mouthful of mud or an empty salmon tin. Jim, I think you and I would get on pretty well as we sat on the bank in the sun and dug our toes in the Oka- tuppa mud, but I might have to disagree with you a little about it being such a fine thing to have "a big bunch of goats." Of course all of our judgments and prejudices, Jim, are affected by past experience, and it may be true that Alabama goats are a companionable lot of acorn eaters. But I know my own present feeling is that a bunch of goats would be just too awful for words. How many times one is a bunch, Jim?

I hope you sold your three hogs, Jim, Jr. I shall be careful to ask always for Okatuppa bacon in the future, and so try to boost the price of any other pork carriers you have to sell. Of course you know how the Irish pro- duce such fine bacon? They only feed their hogs every other day, and so their bacon has those nice even streaks of fat and lean which fit so well around the teeth.

Jim, I think you are wise in renting out so much of your farm. If I owned three hundred acres, I should be careful to rent out 299½. I should want to retain a half acre to hold a swimming hole and a spring board, and I should want a little piece of swamp land where I could raise a few hills of swamp violets and bloodroot. We'll talk about this when I come down, Jim,—in between swims.

BUFORD, GEORGIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Tap, tap! Admit another niece, please, Uncle. She admits there's no such fine bunch of cousins anywhere.

Ruth, you sure are a fine writer. So was that boy who told the doubting swains to chuck their girls into the creek for a paint and powder test. But this seemed too much like caveman times.

Every paper you pick up nowadays has some- thing in it about old King Tut. I wonder if in years hence some one of us—Uncle Lisha, for in- stance—will be brought out of his tomb and shown to a gaping crowd of the cousins of that time? Anyway Uncle will sure need rest after reading this and so many other letters!

I'll make this one short and describe myself. I am tall and slender, have dark brown hair and eyes, and am seventeen years old. All cousins who like to write, let the letters fly to

Your niece and cousin,
RUBYE WALL.

I was struck by the picture your letter sug- gested, Rubye,—that of my being excavated from a Tut-like tomb some thousands of years hence. Think of me laid away surrounded, as was Egypt's young King, with various imple- ments of daily living. There would be disin- terred for eager eyes my beautifully designed bath robe and my gold safety razor; my expen- sive celluloid soap box and the carved and enamelled comb and brush with which I had so many centuries ago arranged my seven re- maining hairs. By my side would be my faith- ful emerald-studded typewriter, my ruby-crus- ted fountain pen and my sapphire-knobbed blue pencil. On a rack at my feet would be placed my embossed storm rubbers and my embroidered Regal shoes, and as a weight upon my linen-swathed chest would rest Billy's Album open at page 976 of the Blonde Section.

King Tut-Ankh-Amen had trays of food placed in his tomb to last him on his journey through the Paths of the Dead. I would thus have a dozen Northern Spy apples, six square feet of soft gingerbread, some corn muffins, a five gallon jug of buttermilk, and a juicy Camenbert cheese.

On one side of the tomb would be a solid wall of letters, twelve feet high and three feet thick. The letters of the Red-haired Division would be arranged above to give the effect of a colored fresco border, and a tiny mummied mule would be on guard over the tiers of Mis- souri missives.

By the time my tomb would be opened, Rubye, our League would have grown, of course, to several millions of Cousins and there would have been several dynasties of Uncles reaching down from the dim days of Uncle Lisha the First. How the committee of exca- vating cousins would crowd about to see the relics of my reign! How the graphics and movies of that time would feature the splen- dors of my resting place and the beauty of my high-nosed peaceful self—an Uncle unwithered by the touch of Time! It is all delightful to think about, Rubye, but there is one adaman- tine obstacle that must leave it all but a dream: Billy, of course, would have to be entombed with me, and no power of man could convert Bill into a Mummy Goat. And then think of me locked up with him in a tomb for three thousand years. O Rubye, Rubye!

HEGINS, PENN.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Hello, everybody! Look who's here—Cousin "Billy"! Oh, I know it's nothing to make a fuss about, but I simply can't help it. When Billy saw my name he became tickled all over, and—well, here I am to relieve the monotony. Ta! Ta! Billy, you be-whiskered rascal, au revoir! Cheek? Well, perhaps.

My description? Well, an artist's description will be inadvisable since many of the fair Cousins would most assuredly be injured in the rush—I am so handsome and magnetic—maybe! How- ever, a brief outline may prove interesting. My age is just over the 'teens, height sixty-eight in- ches, features clean-cut, complexion light, and hair very dark. Now what have we—a paragon? Hardly. Why an ordinary fellow of course. I'll tell you a secret; but don't dare to breathe a word. According to repute I'm not the least bashful or shy—when no girls are near! Sh! not a peep! But on the contrary, I really love to associate with girls who are vivacious, but retain the sense of propriety—like Cousin Ruth for instance. Ha! Ha!

Hegins is a town of approximately 800 popula- tion situated in a beautiful valley in western Schuyl- kill county. It is about twenty miles east of the Susquehanna river, and the scenery is said to be as beautiful as any in the state. The numerous towns and villages scattered throughout the valley are attractive; the people active and prosperous; and there are ample means of recreation. The girls naturally cater to such styles and fads as bobbed hair, dresses that display their shapely er, ah—limbs, too much make-up, etc. Yes, Lykens val- ley is a great place in which to live.

Now for a few words with a disturber of the masculine peace of mind. Ruth, you certainly are breezy—is it due to your exalted position? I presume so. I'll admit your defense of the use of cosmetics was worthy of credit—but wasn't the argument presented by Gus rather sweeping? I think it was. One cannot condemn a cosmetic sim- ply because a few girls use it so as to make them- selves look like fools—those using it to advantage must also be considered. So you're all set for an argument on abbreviated hair? Good! I've a paragraph on that subject, and I don't expect to recant either. Goodness! Ruth. Your passes at Jack convince us that Cleopatra must have seemed like a spurious cent in comparison. You must be some girl, I'll say. But why not vamp Gus when he calls on you during his wanderings? Eh—what? Jack is absolutely hopeless—he likes you—not! How provoking. Ruth, ma cherie, you may be a terrible flirt—but we like you just the same—don't we fellows?

Bobbed hair—how stylish, how beautiful, "and oh! the blessed freedom of it"—no combing, no fussing required. It sounds fine, doesn't it? Won- derful! Ah, but consider the other side of the ques- tion. After the war, parents dropped all restraint, and the flapper needed something unusual to cele- brate the new freedom—consequently bobbed hair, etc. Now it's become a mania. Style? Doubtful! When several millions of our leading club women, and millions of other oppose the new fad, we may consider it a doubtful style—temporary at its best. Oh, I know there are many who favor bobbed hair, but they form only a very small minority. Beautiful? In some cases—yes; but as a general rule—no! One girl has hair sleek as that of a diver; another fluffy or tousled like a ball of down which it resembles not a little. Beautiful—indeed! It's too bad many girls have spoiled one of their finest charms. Bobbed hair may be all right for the girl athlete, or for thin scraggly hair when there is nothing else to do with it; but it is wrong most of the time. And as to freedom, why not clip the pretty locks; or better still shave them off? I am positive this would result in ab- solute freedom. It would not even be necessary to run one's fingers through it. I realize that long hair requires considerable attention and work, but results more than recompense the time and energy expended. Finally, bobbed hair seems to be the flappers' chief means of advertising that they are flappers with knee-length dresses, and a loudly proclaimed ambition to lead their own lives. How foolish!

Now Cousins—although I should like to write a great deal more—I must close and leave you to your varied emotions.

It is quite likely that some of you may wish to express your thoughts. Go to it! You cannot make me angry.

My best regards to all the cousins, Uncle Lisha, and Billy.

COUSIN "BILLY"
(WILLIAM MAYER)

Well, Billy of Hegins, Pa., you seem to be a cheerful person—much more full of cheer than your Brooklyn namesake who, I assure you, was not at all "tickled" by your letter. It was like your optimistic disposition to feel this way about it, but if letters could tickle Billy he would dwell in a state of perpetual ticklement. I need hardly state that this is far from being his condition of disposition. "Picklement" would more aptly describe it. Bill's "sweet- ness and light" are more often eatness and blight! And your letter tried to tickle him in the latest part of the late Spring. That it survived at all was due to the blackness of your typewriter ribbon, I imagine. And speak- ing of this, if you are not the paragon you modestly deny being, Bill, your letter was surely a paragon of correct typing. If I could tease a typewriter like that, I'd be a Happier Uncle than I am—and I keep fairly cheerful around the edges as it is! Your sentences, Cousin Namesake, were as neatly made as your clean-cut and described features!

It's too bad, Billy, that when Lykens valley is so nice, all the girls seem to be just as un- nice as in less lovely living places. I certainly never thought so many critics of young femi- ninity existed! Yet I have a shrewd notion this criticism is always delivered at long range. Just try telling some Lykens valley girl her hair is tousled, thin and scraggly. Bill! Be- lieve me, Old Namesake, your own head-cover- ing is likely to be much thinner and more scrag- gled a few minutes after. It is just as well, perhaps, that Pennsylvania and Minne- sota are separated by many miles and post offices.

DE QUEEN, R. 3. ARKANSAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Will you let an Arkansawyer join your happy band? Please, Uncle, I hope you'll print this, as I want to fool my other uncle with whom I live. He thinks I can't spell well enough to write to the League of Cousins. He says he used to take COM- FORT when Uncle Charlie was head of the League, back in the early nineties and before I was born.

Simple Hair Dressing

THE question of what to do with our hair is always an important one, as we have all discovered. Beautiful hair or abundant hair may be dressed in such an unbecoming way as to lose all its value as a beauty asset. And scanty locks, on the other hand, may be so cleverly disposed as to give the impression of beautiful hair.

Elaborate coiffures, stiff marcelles, and all other forms of hairdressing which look as if one had spent a great amount of time in bedecking one's self, are never attractive. A marcelle rarely looks its best when first put in. The hair is most attractive and most natural after the third day, for then it begins to take on some of the personality of the wearer. Huge bunches of hair over the ears are unbeautiful because unnatural, if for no other reason. The woman whose hair is well-dressed is she who sees that it is immaculately shampooed, carefully brushed, simply put up, but great attention paid to becoming lines.

Most women look best with a slight wave in the hair, though there are exceptions. Study your own face and head, and find out if smooth hair, burnished by much brushing, and disposed with a wavy line on the forehead is more becoming to you than waved hair. If the waved hair is most attractive, then plan to have it waved about once in two weeks. Enough of the wave stays in to be effective.

A simple and becoming way to do the hair is accomplished by parting the hair a little to the left of the middle of the forehead. The hair should first be waved, or should have a slight wave left in it from previous wavings.

While the forehead part leaves most of the hair on the right side, the back hair should be separated in two sections by parting it at about the middle of the back. The left section of the hair should then be gathered loosely down over the tip of the ear and back in a curve to the back of the head, where the ends should be tucked under in a mass extending from the crown of the head to the neck. Do not draw the hair tight, yet pin the back hair securely.

The next step is equally simple. Gather the right section of the hair and draw it back, not down, holding it loosely enough so that it will still cover the tip of the right ear. Grasping the hair at the nape of the neck in such a way as to fluff the hair out loosely from the head, twist the ends firmly and turn them under just at the nape of the neck, fastening the hair securely.

As the left section of the hair has formed a pad down the middle of the back of the head, the right section comes back over this pad and covers it, and there is no part visible anywhere except a very short one at the forehead line and running back a few inches.

This sounds more complicated than it is. The hair can really be put up with about seven motions; exclusive of putting in the hairpins, first, the part, then the separating of the back hair, the drawing down and back of the left section, the tucking under of the ends, the drawing back of the right section, the twisting of the ends, the tucking under.

This is a most attractive way of dressing the hair, but depends for its success upon the hair being frequently shampooed, and wavy, so that it will be fluffy and never oily. In fact, hair is never attractive if it is not carefully shampooed at regular intervals, for it begins to "slink," to look oily, to refuse to obey the coaxing of our fingers as we try to fluff it out at the sides of the head or where it touches the forehead line. So, Pretty Girls, pin your faith to the shampoo once in two weeks—three if the hair is inclined to be dry, not oily—and the first essential of attractive hairdressing will be yours.

Questions and Answers

SOUTH CAROLINA.—My dear, at your age, you should not use "so much powder" and rouge. No wonder your skin looks "yellow and funny" when you go without it. What you are doing is to give no real attention to your skin but to cover it up. The result will be that before you are twenty you will look like an old hag. Now, let's stop this unwise treatment of what would otherwise be, no doubt, a perfectly good skin. It is now clogged with impurities, and prevented from clearing itself through its pores, as it should. Will you take my advice for a month, as one who knows something about what makes a pretty face, and who wants you to look pretty just as much as you can want it yourself. Believe me, you are going the wrong way about it and will be sorry for it in the future, when it is too late to repair your mistake. First, take a good body bath each day, even if it can only consist of rubbing off the body vigorously with a wet towel. Friction the skin gently as you do this to stimulate it to act. Every night before going to bed, wash the face thoroughly in warm soapy water. You can buy a camel's-hair complexion brush at your druggist, for about 25 cents—don't take anything but camel's hair, as stiffer brushes injure the skin. With this scrub the face gently with plenty of the warm soapy water. Do not rub soap on the face but dissolve it in the water. Scrub behind the ears, in the folds of the neck, everywhere, until you are spotlessly clean. Then rinse the face with the brush and warm clear water, then with cool water, and finally dash cold water on the skin to bring the blood to the surface and stimulate the pores to action. In the morning, bathe the face in tepid water, which as you know is water which is just a little warmer than cool. If you use any powder at all, and I wish you would not, rub a little cold cream all over the face before applying. Wipe off the cold cream thoroughly with a bit of cotton or a soft cloth, then dust on just the tiniest bit of powder, smoothing it with a puff of cotton or a soft cloth. Do not use any rouge. You don't want to be unfashionable do you, but more like the girls of the big and wealthy families who live in the large cities? They are not allowed to use rouge or cosmetics until they are old enough to "come out", and even then very sparingly. Cosmetics of this kind are reserved for the older woman who may reasonably be supposed to need some additions to her complexion. The secret of a good complexion is keeping the skin of the face, and the body as well, scrupulously clean. Do not eat between meals, eat sparingly of sweets, as too many sweets would tend to make your complexion yellow. Drink plenty of water, and you know that means at least eight glasses a day. Eat fruits. Keep the bowels regular and open, by exercise, proper food, plenty of fruit, but not by cathartics. Don't forget that exercise is essential to bodily beauty as well as bodily health. You need exercise. You might increase your height by constant daily exercises, persisted in and practiced vigorously. Do all the outdoor things you can, as well.

M. K.—At your age it is unlikely that you can increase your height, but by choosing long lines in your clothes, instead of well-marked waistlines, you will make yourself look taller. You do not tell me height or weight or anything about yourself except the color of your hair, so I am somewhat at sea as to how to advise you. To gain in weight, however, you must eat the fat-building foods, which are potatoes, rice, cream, milk, butter, white bread, macaroni, fat meats, etc. But to get fat-building materials out of your food, you must chew your food thoroughly and digest it. Hot breads, griddle cakes, etc., pork, veal, are difficult of digestion. It is better to eat foods that do not require so much of our stomachs. We get more nourishment out of them. So if you will eat fruit, first, for breakfast—an orange, grapefruit, apple baked or raw, stewed prunes soaked over night and stewed gently for an hour or more, etc.; next, a big bowl of cereal with cream, and some thin, hot buttered toast, then one or two soft-boiled eggs, you will not only have plenty of nourishment but you will have fat-building as well as strength-building elements given to the body. For dinner eat baked potatoes, rather than boiled. Fried potatoes are hard to digest, and do not give you the same nourishment, and we must think of that if we are trying to gain in weight or health Eat any kind of fish, fowl, rare roasted, broiled beef, mutton and lamb. Round steak put through the grinder, made into balls and broiled, is good food for you, though not fattening. Your potato, white bread and butter, adds the fattening element. For desserts, custards, ice-cream, blanc mange, boiled rice with sugar and cream, berries with cream and sugar, rice pudding, cornmeal pudding, with cream or milk, tapioca pudding, are all good. Pies are not good for you, and cake should be eaten in moderation, and only at meals. Before going to bed, if you do not retire for two or more hours after supper, eat a dish of rice, sugar and cream. Of course the milk diet is a very desirable way of gaining weight. One must for the first week, cut out all solid food except a six o'clock supper of simple foods, and drink a glass of milk every hour from about seven-thirty until three-thirty. This is assuming that you rise at seven, drink two glasses of hot water on rising, and that you do not swallow your milk rapidly but sip it. For the following weeks, all solid food must be given up, and a glass and a half of milk taken every hour from seven-thirty until six-thirty. Weigh on the afternoon of each week, of course weighing on the morning of the day you begin your milk diet. The bowels should be perfectly free, and if you will put to soak half-a-dozen prunes at night in a tumbler of warm water, and eat them in the morning, chewing them until liquid and drinking the water as well, this will help. But before starting on the treatment, you should live for one day on fruit and water, to give the bowels a chance to clear themselves. The "small lumps" you speak of are caused, I judge, by imperfect action of the pores, showing that you need daily exercises night and morning, or by foods that do not agree with you. In either case, you should at once start simple exercises daily, night and morining, while in your nightclothes, with fresh air in the room, practicing them for ten or fifteen minutes, changing from one kind of exercise to another before it tires you; and you should use the wisest judgment about your diet. As I said earlier in this answer to your questions, dresses of long lines are most suitable to your figure. For colors, with medium brown hair, assuming that your eyes are brown or hazel, good colors are olive green, mahogany, wine color, seal brown, with touches of yellow or turquoise blue with the green, of dark moss green with the wine color, or old rose or sage green with the mahogany, and of orange with the brown. You can also wear a dark pinkish tan, mousegray, dark bronze, navy blue, black, maltese gray.

SECOND STEP! TWISTING THE ENDS OF RIGHT HALF.

KEWPIE.—You have lots of troubles, haven't you? Well, let us see what we can do for them. Read my answer to "M. K." about increasing weight A good exercise for the flat chest and prominent collar bone is as follows:

To Develop a Flat Chest

Stand with heels together, toes slightly pointed out, drop the shoulders and elevate the chest as much as possible, letting the arms hang loosely at the sides. Now stretch them out on a level with the shoulders, at each side. Tense the body, and force the hands toward each other as if something were holding back the arms from doing this. Keep the arms always on the shoulder level and the elbows rigid. Bring the hands together in this manner in front of the body. Now throw the arms back forcibly as far as possible, still on shoulder level. Inhale as you do this, and as you force the hands together in front exhale. You can develop your chest the best by breathing, so all exercises must be accompanied by inhaling and exhaling.

For a breathing exercise, stand erect, as before, shoulders dropped and chest up and breathe in through the nose slowly while you mentally count six; then exhale very slowly counting six. When you can, increase the count to seven, then to eight, then to ten, but it will no doubt take you some time to do this if your chest is inactive. If you will practice breathing exercises ten minutes at a time,

Any Woman May Now Be Beautiful

By Madame Maree

The slow tedious methods now commonly employed in trying to acquire beauty should be forgotten and in their place these few formulas should be used faithfully for results which you have so long sought.

For Promoting Hair Growth

The open secret of really forcing hair to grow is the proper stimulation, not merely of the scalp, but of the hair roots. This is done scientifically, and in a really wonderful way too, by a mixture which you can easily make up yourself at home, consisting of one ounce of beta-quinol, one ounce of glycerine and one pint of water. This makes up a full pint of the best hair-grower I have ever known. The hair should be washed at least every week or ten. The very best shampoo one can get is to dissolve a teaspoonful of eggol in a cup of hot water.

To Have a Spotless Complexion

You will find that the sallowness, red spots, freckles and other blemishes of the face, arms, hands, neck and shoulders will promptly disappear, and in their place you may have as exquisite a complexion as you could ever hope for, by simply mixing together one ounce of purpurin obtainable at any drug store, two tablespoonfuls of glycerine and half pint of water. Apply frequently and liberally as a cream.

You May Look Years Younger

Remarkable success has been obtained in removing crows' feet, deep and shallow wrinkles, lines of age and sagging cheeks by the use of my following formula. It makes the skin more vigorous and plump and the change to youthfulness is striking. Simply mix two ounces of spirit, which you can get at your druggists, with half pint of water and two tablespoonfuls of glycerin. Use this every day.

Removes Muddiness in Few Minutes

It sounds very remarkable to say that one may get rid of blackheads, big ones and little ones, in only a few minutes, but such is the case if the following method is used. Sprinkle some peroxin powder on a sponge made wet with hot water and rub this on the blackheads. The result is surprising, every blackhead and skin pore impurity is dissolved away instantly.

Best Way to Treat Superfluous Hair

Superfluous hair should be dissolved away, instead of burned off, as is now so commonly done. The only thing I have ever known that would "dissolve" superfluous hair is simple sulfo ess tion. By applying this, even the stiffest hairs on very tender portions of the body are removed without leaving the slighest mark, red spots or irritation. It is ideal.

If your druggist should be out of any of these famous beautifiers you can get them by writing to Cooper Pharmacal Co., 650 Thompson Bldg. Chicago, Ill. Select the beautifier you feel the most need of, enclose $1.00 and they will send include a regular 50 cent box of their wonderful face powder. But try the druggist first.

a long moment the girl sat silent, as thing were weighing on her mind. Billy se by her side, thinking a great deal

"You know," she said presently, "I'll never be contented again to be shut in at home, and deprived of all the pleasures other girls my age have. Why can't I dance, and have parties, and have young men call on me, like other girls? Oh, I get so blue at times that I begin to think that nobody loves me——"

Her eyes suddenly drooped with tears, the discovery of which affected Billy deeply. He leaned close to her.

"Stella, I love you!" he whispered.

"Why, no! Of course not! You haven't known me long enough——"

"I've known you a thousand years!" he declared boldly.

This brought a sigh to her lips, so irresistible that Billy caught her in his arms and, before she could have realized what was happening, kissed her.

"How dare you!" she cried indignantly. Her lips began to tremble, and tears flowed freely from her eyes. "I thought you were a friend."

This brought compunction to Billy; he drew away guiltily, and tried to apologize.

"I—I'm sorry," he murmured; "I couldn't help it. I am sincere when I say I love you. I have wanted to tell you all the week, but you wouldn't let me. And when a fellow loves a girl he can't help wanting to kiss her—especially when she is as sweet and pretty as you are."

Her indignation melted away at this, and with a winsome little laugh she leaned shyly to him. "I'm not angry, Billy," she confessed; "but you frightened me. It is the very first time in all my life I've ever been kissed——"

"Then, dear, won't you tell me you love me?"

"I don't know," she faltered, "I've never had a lover."

"But you have one now! Won't you say——"

She snuggled her red head against Billy's shoulder and murmured: "Kiss me again!"

It was a quarter past eleven when Billy and Stella started on their thirty-mile journey to Stella's home. Billy was blissfully unaware of what lay ahead of him. A little spin of thirty miles was not unusual, even at 11:15 P. M. The unusual part of it all was the girl at his side. He was wrapped in ecstatic thought about her; and the night air, or something, had produced quietness in her. They were several miles out of town before either spoke.

"Oh, was that lightning?" Stella gave a little cry at sight of a flash in the far distance.

"It's just heat-lightning," explained Billy.

Before they had gone much farther, however, the lightning became more distinct; a heavy thunder cloud came rolling out of the southwest with a fury and a suddenness more suggestive of a cyclone than of a summer rain. The girl was plainly frightened. Billy's little car had no top, or protection, and he began to speed up in an effort to reach shelter before the storm began. They had not gotten far when the good road came abruptly to an end. The car plunged into a stretch of impassable mud and the engine went dead.

"We're stuck," announced Billy with a groan, stepping out into the deep slush.

"Oh, surely not!" Stella exclaimed disconcertedly.

And then the heavens opened and the rain descended. Lightning wrought havoc without warning. The thunder boomed overhead with a tremendous roar, trees snapped and fell with a crash, and the two young people huddled together, driven into distraction with fright, and drenched. The rain continued to come down in torrents for what seemed to be an eternity. When finally it ceased the couple was almost insensible with cold and fear.

"It's over," Billy managed to murmur between clattering teeth; "but we'll never get away from here."

And Stella regained sensibility sufficient to cry.

By and by Billy heard a low, rumbling sound and he perked up his ears. It was a wagon approaching.

"Hey there!" called Billy as loudly as he could to the traveler.

"Whoa!" he heard a voice. "Halloa! Wall, I'll be—What in thunderation's this!"

"We're stuck in the mud, and most drowned," explained Billy through the darkness. "Can you give us a lift?"

"Ho, ho, ho-ho;" came a harsh, vulgar laugh that made the young man want to wring the owner's neck. "Yer some of them autymobilists, I take it," jeered the voice.

"Can you help us?" persisted Billy.

"Autymobilists,—wall, I reckon not! Giddap!"

"Wait, wait!" cried Billy. "There's a lady——"

"Whoa! A lady, eh? Wall, if it's help fer yer autymobile, I can't see ye, sonny; but the lady—I reckon I c'n take her on to Crumleyville. That's fer as I go."

"Both of us?" implored Billy.

"Wall, I reckon," drawled the countryman. Come on an' crawl in behind."

Billy and Stella groped their way through the mud to the one-horse wagon and managed to find room in the back.

Soaked, cold, numb, and terrified, they rambled on through the pit-black night to the country village.

Presently they heard their benefactor say, "Whoa!" and they saw that he was stopping in front of a house.

"I reckon ye'd better put up here fer the rest of the night," he said. "This is 'bout as fer as I go."

"Yes, yes," assented Billy.

"H'lo!" called the man in a stentorian voice, and they saw a door open and a lantern appear.

"Seth Howton, I got some custom fer ye," explained the man. "A couple e-lopers, I take it, who got stuck with their autymobile. I reckon they'll be wantin' ye to hunt up the parson in th' mornin' maybe."

"I'll take care of 'em," said the innkeeper.

They followed him into the crude country inn. He turned to Billy and said, winking one eye: "E-lopers, eh?"

Billy was too weary to resent insults or make explanations, so he merely muttered, "Show us our rooms."

The night of horror finally passed on into a beautiful Sabbath morning. The couple that met in the upstairs corridor that morning presented a ludicrous contrast to the summer glory outside. That their clothes had been dried during the night was their only solace. Disheveled, disheartened, despaired, they marched down the stairs, facing frantically the coming catastrophe.

"Wall, here's the e-lopers!" greeted the innkeeper. "An' I've got a parson on hand—he spent the night here——"

As their eyes followed his indication they saw a tall, lanky, old gentleman standing in the doorway, his eyes sternly fixed on the girl.

"It's Father!" she whispered, taking a reluctant step toward him.

The clergyman approached his unlucky daughter, his face fixed, his eyes fiery.

"What does this mean?" he demanded.

"They want to git married," chirped in the innkeeper.

"No, no," faltered Stella.

"Who is this man?" her father asked, nodding his head toward Billy.

"This—this is Billy—Mr. Woodward—a friend of Melcena's," stammered Stella, pink and trembling.

Billy met the minister, offering him his hand, and trying to appear calm. The old man ignored his approach, however, "Are you really attempting to marry this man?" he snapped at his daughter. "But surely there can be no other reason——"

"Father, let me explain——"

"No use to try to explain. You—my daughter—broke her promise. My own daughter! A disgrace! What can I do? What have I done? My own daughter here, spending the night in a public inn—with a strange man! O Lord!" he cried, lifting his eyes, "why hast Thou forsaken me!" He stopped suddenly, lowered his voice and said, "I know! I must save my own child! 'Let him that is without sin cast the first stone!'"

"Father, please!" supplicated Stella. "Don't take on like that! I don't understand you. Everything is all right. Let me explain!"

The old man turned his eyes, half-closed, to Billy. "Young man," he said slowly; "do you wish to marry my daughter?"

"No sir."

"I thought not! Well, you will! This day—understand?"

"Yes sir."

"But Father!" protested Stella, highly excited.

"Be calm, daughter! It is the only way to save the honor of the family."

And Stella was calm.

The minister went out in search of the proper official to issue a marriage license, leaving the astounded couple under the guardianship of the innkeeper.

They mechanically drew together at the window.

"Stella," said Billy softly, "Last night you told me you loved me—and I kissed you. We can escape while he is gone—or, do you love me enough to marry me like this?"

"Oh, Billy!" she whispered, her eyes beaming. "Don't you dare interfere! This is the happiest moment of my life."

three times a day, and will remember to keep the shoulders drooped and to consciously throw out the chest without forcing the shoulders back, you will soon notice an improvement not only in your chest measurement but in your health and your appearance. Take a tapemeasure and measure your chest carefully, then at the end of a month of persistent breathing exercises and arm exercises, measure it again. Another arm exercise is as follows:

Another Exercise

Standing in correct position, outstretch the arms with the fingers just slightly curved so they will not be tense. Now raise the arms above the head, palms forward, muscles rigid, inhaling as you do so. Lower the arms slowly to the sides, exhaling. Repeat many times.

I couldn't tell you whether a crooked nose could be straightened by a nose brace. I should rather doubt it. As to the yellow teeth, try rubbing them with a bit of cotton dipped in peroxide and fastened to an orange-wood stick. Bowlegs at sixteen are probably pretty "set in their ways". Your friend might try practicing for ten minutes night and morning the following exercise.

With legs about ten inches apart, bend them inward until the foot is resting on its inner side. Then back to normal, then in, back, in, back. The body should be held erect, shoulders dropped, chest up.

As to your hair, if you want to wear it hanging, the only way to dress it is to part it on the side, gather a portion of the hair back from the face just above ear and fasten with a barette. The only object of this is to keep the loose hair from falling on the face. If you wanted to wear it in some other fashion, I should think you might comb the hair until it was just about midway of the back of the head, tie, then pin your curls in a simple loosened mass at that point. Not in a knot, you understand, but just as loose curls held in position here and there with pins. At your age you do not need to bleach the face except through bathing and food. If your face needs bleaching, begin to eat fruit in quantities, take a daily body bath, and drink lots of water. This will clear the skin, besides making it more beautiful. Tell your friend with the yellow teeth to brush them five times a day, on rising, with a good toothpaste, after breakfast, after lunch, after supper, and before going to bed. A good exercise for the thighs is as follows:

To Develop the Thighs

Standing erect, chest out, head up, back straight, knees rigid, throw the arms above the head, palms out, elbows stiff. Now throw them out and down, trying to touch the floor with the tips of the fingers. You may not be able to do this to begin with, but make the effort. Practice every day, night and morning, and in time you will be able to touch the floor. Remember the knees must be kept stiff. Another exercise is to place the left foot about eighteen inches ahead of the right foot, throw the arms above the head, then down and attempt to touch the floor just in front of the right toe. The right knee should be stiff, but the left one may be slightly bent. Now for your last question. Here is a good recipe for a hand-whitening lotion:

To Whiten the Hands

Orange-flower water two ounces; Rosewater two ounces; borax one-quarter of a dram; spirits of benzoin one-half dram; bruised almonds one-half ounce. Add the almonds to the orange-flower water and the rosewater, let stand for twenty-four hours, add the borax, shake until dissolved, then drop by drop add the benzoin, while constantly stirring or shaking. Before using this, wash the hands thoroughly, then apply the lotion and a tiny bit of strained honey, massaging the mixture into the skin. Do this several times in one evening, then coat the hands with lanolin, draw on a pair of very loose cotton gloves and go to bed with the assurance that your hands will be much improved before morning.

Feeding Baby

FOR this month's talk we hope to be able to offer some helpful suggestions in regard to feeding baby. We shall not try to tell you about the calorics, or heat units in the different foods, or use any scientific terms, but use terms that can be understood by everyone. In the first place every healthy mother should nurse her baby, as there is something in the mother's milk that no chemist has been able to imitate.

Mother's milk first and always is the proper food for a baby, and the cemeteries and the statistics with the high death rate of young babies bear witness to the truth of this statement.

There is no doubt that infants nursed at the breast have a lower deathrate, and resist sickness better than bottle fed babies.

One can hardly believe that a mother who is healthy and able to nurse her offspring would refuse to do so, yet it is true now and has been for centuries.

Cæsar reproached the Roman women for not nursing their babies and moralists of all epochs have taken the same stand.

Unfortunately many women can not nurse their babies on account of undeveloped breasts, or a gland that does not secrete anything, or nipples that a baby cannot grasp, or the condition of the mother's health,—tuberculosis for example. These things, of course, make nursing impossible, and in these cases artificial feeding must be substituted.

The contraindications to a mother's nursing baby are, general poor health from tuberculosis, severe anæmia, advanced Bright's disease, diabetes, diseases of breast, as an abscess or severe inflammation, absence of nipples, inverted nipples, and when you are positive that the mother's milk does not agree with baby.

We say when you are positive that the mother's milk does not agree with baby, and we mean by this when the nursing mother uses good judgment about her own diet and keeps her own bowels and digestion in a normal condition, and yet her milk does not agree with her baby.

If the mother eats anything and everything at all times, has gas and indigestion, of course her milk will not agree with baby.

A mistake has been made in a great many cases of giving up nursing baby, thinking the milk did not agree with baby, when the milk or baby were not at fault at all, but the mother's poor judgment about her own digestion.

The newborn baby should be put to the breast as soon as the mother is rested, in ordinary cases in about eight hours, then every four hours until the milk comes, then every two hours during the day and every four hours during the night.

Once a day baby's mouth should be washed out with boracic acid solution or Glycothymoline, teaspoonful to tablespoonful of warm water, also the nipples should be washed.

At first you may have to give baby a little warm water, but do not give over six ounces in a day in a bottle with nipple. Do not allow baby to lie all night with the nipple in its mouth or you will have started a bad habit, and with babies it is far easier to start a bad habit than it is to stop the same.

You may have trouble at first getting baby to nurse, and if you do, put some hot wet compresses on the breasts, which brings the milk to the surface, then squeeze a little of the milk into its mouth. The first few days the baby does not get anything but colostrum, which acts as a laxative on the bowels.

You can give baby a tablespoonful of warm water, and if this does not seem to satisfy and baby acts hungry, put a teaspoonful of cream in an ounce of water, or an ounce of cow's milk diluted one half with warm water.

If the mother does not seem to have milk enough she should drink lots of liquids, milk, cocoa, broths, gruels, and oyster stews.

Cow's milk is the next best food if mother can not nurse baby, but it has to be modified a little to make it more like mother's milk.

To do this you must dilute it, as the curd of cow's milk can not be digested by baby, also add a little sugar to milk as mother's milk contains more sugar than cow's milk.

Of course, when you dilute the cow's milk you lessen the amount of fat and must add cream to bring this up to the proper percentage.

This is called modifying milk, which is simply diluting cow's milk and adding the things needed to make it as near mother's milk as possible.

Would suggest the following to feed baby during the first two weeks, cream 2½ ounces, water 17 ounces, lime water one ounce, sugar of milk one-half teaspoonful, this gives ten feedings of two ounces at a feeding. For 3rd and 4th weeks cream 5 ounces, sugar of milk one-half teaspoonful, lime water two ounces, water 24, this gives ten feedings of three ounces at a feeding.

The daily amount of food required by a baby is as follows: 3rd to 7th day 10 ounces, 2nd to 5th week 15 to 30 ounces, 6th week to 3rd month 28 to 36 ounces, 3rd to 6th month 30 to 38 ounces, 9th to 12th month 32 to 45 ounces.

A small baby will not require as much as the above and a large baby will need more. A baby should be fed as much as it can digest properly, but the mother must use good judgment in regard to this as a baby may be crying from colic, and the mother, thinking it is hungry, gives it more food, which it takes quickly as if hungry, when as a matter of fact it has already taken too much food, and you are adding to its trouble. The mother can not depend on the baby being hungry when it cries, as there are many things besides hunger that makes baby cry.

The subject for our next month's talk will be, Feeding Baby, CONTINUED.

Questions and Answers

WEANING BABY.—My baby girl is two years old and I am writing to ask if I had better wean her now or wait until Fall, after green vegetable are gone? What can I give her to eat and what shall I give her for constipation?

MRS. H. M., Tawas City, Mich.

MRS. A. B., Bunney, Ark. Please read.

A.—Wean baby at once; as a rule babies should be weaned when they are eleven months. Her diet should consist of milk, one quart per day, coddled eggs, baked potato, oatmeal, cream of wheat, molasses cookies, orange juice, prune juice.

I think her diet will relieve the constipation, but if it does not, give her teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia often enough to keep bowels regular.

WORMS OR ADENOIDS.—My three-year-old boy has enlarged tonsils and adenoids, is nervous, fretful, picks his nose, screams in his sleep, is sometimes constipated, but will feel well all day until just before supper when he will vomit, then have fever all night. Sometimes he will have cramps in his stomach. Are these conditions due to the tonsils and adenoids, or has he worms?

MRS. L. P. M., Everett, Wash.

A.—Your boy certainly has indigestion, which may be caused by errors in diet, eating too fast or too often, or eating things his stomach is not strong enough to digest. Keep his bowels regular with teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia, given in milk, and give him simple foods like cooked cereals, coddled eggs, custards, broths and a little baked potato once a day.

Get some tablets containing one-half grain each of calomel and santonin, and give him one every three hours until bowels move freely, and examine the stools for worms.

In regard to enlarged tonsils and adenoids, they affect a child to just the extent they impose on its breathing and swallowing, and sooner or later should have them removed.

FEEDING BABY.—Tell me what to feed my eleven-months-old baby; can not get fresh milk but can get condensed milk, or malted milk. Baby is constipated.

MRS. J. M., Cheat Bridge, W. Va.

A.—The cow's milk is better, but you can use either the condensed milk or malted milk, cooked cereals, coddled eggs, baked potato, custards, molasses cookies, stale wheat bread toasted; give teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia often to keep bowels free.

COLD.—What can I do for my three-year-old baby who has had a cold in her chest all winter? Her hands and feet are cold most of the time.

MRS. C. I., New Leipzig, N. Dak.

A.—Build up her general health with good, nourishing food; also give her Maltine with Cod Liver Oil, keep chest protected with flannels, rubbing on a little camphorated oil. Get her out of doors all you can, well protected with clothes.

Give her three drop doses of Tincture of Chloride of Iron, in syrup, three times a day.

CONSTIPATED BABY.—What can I do for my four-months-old nursing baby, as her bowels move only every second or third day?

Her navel never healed properly, and when she cries out it bleeds. MRS. F. W., Eaton, Colo.

A.—Get your own bowels regular and your nursing baby's will be the same. Eat lots of fruit, apples, oranges, prunes, and if needed take two teaspoonful doses of Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada once a day.

For the sore navel would suggest that you touch up the raw surface with Nitrate of Silver stick, then dusting on a little powdered sulphur.

If this does not heal it up, take your baby to a surgeon for an examination, as a bleeding navel should not be allowed to go untreated.

IRRITATING URINE.—What can I do for my four-year-old girl, as her urine has a bad odor, and she is so irritated that she can hardly stand it?

MRS. J. M., Taylorsville, Ky.

A.—I think you would find on examination that she had a highly acid urine, which causes the irritation.

Put her on a milk diet, adding tablespoonful of lime water to every four ounces.

Dissolve teaspoonful of Cream of Tarter in glass of water, and get her to take two glasses of this every day.

Have her sit in Sitz bath while urinating, you can do this by small bath tub, or large wash bowl nearly filled with warm water.

Oxide of Zinc Ointment will heal up the irritated surface, but you must remove the cause.

WORMS.—How can I find out if my six-year-old boy has worms? MRS. E. S., Bullard, Oregon.

A.—Get a tablet or powder from your druggist containing one-half grain each of Calomel and Santonin, and give him one of them every three hours, until bowels move freely, and examine stools for worms. If worms are found, repeat two or three times allowing two days between treatments.

DIET DURING PREGNANCY.—BABY'S CLOTHES.—What should I eat during pregnancy, and what clothes does a baby born in September or October need?

MRS. W. M. M., Crescent, Okla.

MRS. C. E. S., Winston-Salem, N. C.

A.—Eat anything you wish during pregnancy, keeping bowels and kidneys in normal condition.

An Autumn baby should have the following: One flannel receiving blanket; three flannel abdominal bands, 18 inches long and five inches wide, pinked not hemmed; three shirts; pinning blanket of outing flannel; three night dresses of outing flannel; three dozen diapers made out of cheesecloth or cotton diaper cloth.

A baby's wardrobe varies of course, like an adult's, depending on the amount of money one can afford to invest, but these things mentioned are the needed things.

SORE NAVEL.—My baby is three months old and the navel has not healed. Is there any danger of hemorrhage? MRS. H. E. M., Tarkio, Mo.

A.—Yes there is danger of hemorrhage, also danger of an umbilical rupture. Touch up the raw surface with Nitrate of Silver stick, and then dust on a little powdered sulphur, or boracic acid powder. Do this two or three times a week, or dust on powder every day, but use the Nitrate of Silver two or three times a week until it heals up.

If you are not successful in this treatment, consult a surgeon, do not wait for baby to outgrow this condition.

DECAYED TEETH.—What causes my thirteen-months-old baby girl's teeth to decay? They begin to crumble and decay as soon as they come through the gums. MRS. G. W. A., Oneonta, Ala.

MRS. M. A. J. Waltham, Maine,, MRS. G. J. S., Please read.

A.—This is caused by a hyperacidity of the secretions of the mouth.

Give baby two or three ounces of lime water a day in her milk, teaspoonful doses once a day of milk of magnesia.

Rinse out mouth with Glycothymoline, teaspoonful to tablespoonful of warm water.

BIRTHMARK.—My sixteen-months-old baby girl has a birthmark on her left hip, that has increased from the size of a dime to the size of a fifty cent piece; seems sore and is swollen as if it would bleed. If she is cold the spot turns purple.

MRS. C. H., McComb, Miss.

A.—While we do not believe in birthmarks, there are many marks on babies that are unexplainable, but without much doubt are caused by pressure in utero interfering with normal cell growth, and development.

If unsightly, or annoys in any way, have it removed, which is a simple operation.

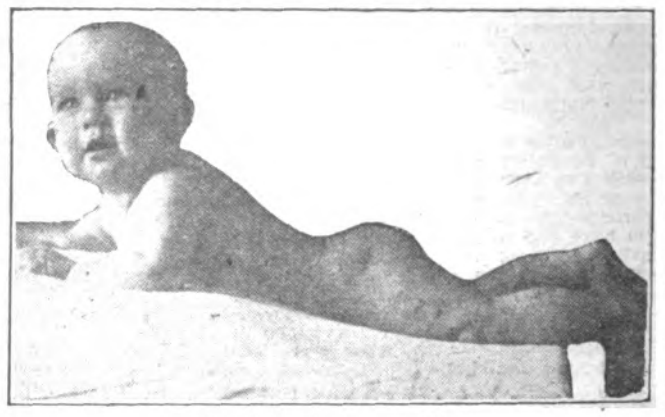
Here it is, Mother think of my ideal husband. All I knew was that I was hopelessly in love with him and that he reciprocated. After more than five years of married life, such happiness of which I never dreamed, we are more in love than ever, being blessed with two sweet children. So I know that love and happiness can come with someone far from your ideal. My husband is thirteen years older than I am, five feet, eight inches in height, blond hair and blue eyes and —a cigarette fiend. Claims to be a Baptist, but has been to church less than a half-a-dozen times since we were married, but really is a true gentleman, lives clean and upright morally and loves the Lord. When we were married we had less than one hundred dollars between us and the world. Have known poverty too well, but we are gradually paying for our home and it is furnished nicely. But the greatest thing in both our lives was our great love for each other, our home and our babies.

So Ruby, when Mr. Right comes along you may be sure that you will do just as I did,—love and marry without thinking of your ideal. Hence the laugh!

May you all be as happy as I am.



MRS. JIM.

ILLINOIS.

DEAR SISTERS AND EVERYBODY:

I will describe my ideal husband,—not the one I have but the one I would like to have. The one I have never did suit me because I never liked his disposition.

First of all, my husband should love me. Second, he should be kind to me when I am sick, willing to wait on me and give me something for a sick person to eat and never leave me alone for a whole day at a time when I am sick in bed. Third, he must be a Christian and have a clean character. He should not swear or use tobacco. Fourth, he should not mistreat me in any way, choke, kick, or hit me on the head. I should like my husband to take me out in public with him, to church and other places. He must be a home-loving man and do his part toward making the living. I believe in both sharing alike and helping one another. He should not quarrel with me all the time. He should protect and stand by me, never siding in with his relations if they should not like or mistreat me. Love is the great essential. Oh, yes, my ideal husband should be willing to take a bath once in a while and never go to bed with dirty feet, and with his dirty shirt on.

I wonder if I will ever have an ideal husband?

MRS. IDA.

"Our Ideal Man"

Backward, turn backward, O Time in thy flight.
Give us a man with shoes not so tight;
With toes made for pencils if one wished to write.
Give us the man with a coat that just fits
Minus fancy pinch backs and up-the-back splits,
Oh give us a man who is liberal with pelf.
Who can talk for an hour and not mention himself.
Oh, give us the man though his shirt's like a rag,
Yet does not resemble a Bolshevik flag.
Yes give us a man with a tie not so loud.
That he looks like a comic as he walks through the crowd,
Oh, give us the man who's impartial to drink,
Who don't use "hooch" whiskey to muddle his think.
Yes, give us the man with untainted breath,
Minus filthy tobacco which brings on his death,
Pray give us the man no matter what age;
Who would submit his past unashamed to the stage.
Yes give us the man who can act a man's part.
The man long departed with honor and heart,
Oh, where is the honor which men once did boast?
It expired with knighthood and left not its ghost.
Oh, send us a man who will women protect,
And not stare at them to find some defect,
In their dress, ways, or manners so he may jeer
The down-trodden sex with some cruel sneer.
Give us the man wherever he roams,
He can think of his mother and sisters at home.
And when he would sneer at some wayward defect
He remembers all women are sisters in sex.
Give us the man without a defect
Yet can see the mistakes of his own wayward sex;
And remedy them and there'll be fewer groans
About how women dress abroad and at home.
Yes backward turn backward O Time if you can,
Efface all these blackguards and send us—a man.

INDIANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for several years and have wished to write for some time but the article on the Ideal Husband has put that wish into action so here I am.

This is my ideal.

He must be clean and neat, not necessarily handsome. He must be free from the habits of smoking, drinking, gambling and using profane language. He must be patient and cheerful, optimistic and courteous. He must be as pure as the girl ... or whom he hopes will be his wife.

He must love his home and children best of ...

Last, but not least, he must be a consistent Christian.

DO I hear you say, "there ain't no such creature"? Come down in the southern part of Indiana to ... me and I will introduce you to a six-foot, ... headed specimen of humanity who fills every ... quirement I have set forth.

Sisters, if we, as pure women, would demand ... same moral qualities in men that they require ... the world would have cleaner homes than it ... today. We should bring up our boys to be as pure as our girls.

I am 34 years old, five feet, four inches tall ... weigh 130 pounds. Have light brown curly ... blue eyes and a fair complexion. I am the mother of six children, four boys and two girls. One little girl has gone to her home in Heaven and we are ... trying to live so as to meet her there. I have been ... twelve years to one of the best men in the world and I hope to be an ideal wife to him.

HAPPY WIFE AND MOTHER.

BUCKHANNON, West Virginia.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT for many, many years. It was my first visit and I came with me my little grandson, ... that his bright eyes can ... back at me from the ... Corner of COMFORT. The ... is Richard Newton Linger. The picture was taken when he was five months old.

I do so much enjoy the ... letters and receive many ... suggestions from them. It is great to read of so many ... "making good" with what ... things they have at their command. When I commenced housekeeping, almost thirty-five years ago, most of the furnishings in our little log cabin were made from boxes and I am glad that it is not altogether a lost art, for such things can be very conveniently arranged until better ones can be bought.

I am very much interested in ... children and flowers.

MRS. G. TEXAS.

HELLO FRIENDS:

I notice the editor's suggestion of a subject for February number of COMFORT. "My Ideal Husband" is a good subject and deserves careful consideration. Girls, we can't be too careful in selecting our life companion. I wish to describe my ideal husband.

He, first of all, must be a Christian, in the true sense of the word, of the same religious belief as myself. He must be a man superior to myself in some respects in order that I may look up to and honor him. A man who marries a woman inferior to himself lifts her to his level but a woman who marries beneath herself is dragged to her husband's level. He must be a man of honor, with a good character as well as a good reputation. He must be educated to value the things that are worth while in this life and the life to come. He must be a companion to me, one who will bear, suffer and enjoy with me everything that life would bring to me. He must have a congenial spirit and be near my age; opinions, tastes, habits and thoughts should be similar to my own. He should enjoy what I enjoy, dislike what I dislike, approve of what I approve of and condemn what I condemn; not for the purpose of agreeing with me but of his own free will. He must be competent to advise me. He must have so lived his life that I can have unlimited trust and faith in him. He must have kept himself free and pure, waiting for the right one. I have very little patience with the boys and girls who have no regard for the sacredness of love. My ideal husband has always known there was one and only one for him and he has been content to await her coming, without flirting with other girls. No, I'm not jealous for when one is completely there is no room for jealousy. He must be proud, grateful and content with my love for him, my voice should be his sweetest music, my smile his brightest joy. He must conduct himself well in society and be always willing to help when help is needed. I should prefer him to be a farmer. It seems to me we are more free and more likely to find internal peace in the free, pure air of the country; also that it is the natural associate of good morals. I care nothing for the ... looking for the painted, powdered, let-mother-do-the-work girl. I don't want the boy who ... the street corner all day watching such girls. He must be industrious and not use intoxicants. Last,

A Forgotten Love

Her cheeks were scarlet, her eyes glittering ith the fire that scorched her heart. The emory of each tender, lying word he had ever aid to her rose up and added fuel to that flame f eager vengeance. He had ruined Gillian's fe, he had killed all mercy and forgiveness in acky; he stood clear while they two must uffer and hide, going in terror of their lives.

"Oh, no!" said the girl who hated him, with quick clenching of her tender hands. "Oh, o, he sha'n't!"

Her lips were set as no woman's ever should e as she opened the door of her poor lodging nd stole in gently, not to waken Gillian.

Her caution was wasted. Gillian, fully ressed, pale, half-frantic, sat on the edge of heir bed.

"Come here," she whispered, and clutched t Jacky passionately. "Oh! where have you een? Why did you leave me like that? I've led a hundred deaths!" Great tears slipped own her anguished face.

"I've been——" Gillian's hand was on her ister's burning lips.

"Hush! Don't speak above your breath. Ve've been mad ever to talk aloud in this ouse. Tell me, did any one see you go out r in?"

"No one. It wouldn't matter if they did," hortly.

"Everything matters—when you're hunted!" ith a sharp catch of her breath.

"But we're not—not yet."

Gillian, her tears on her white cheeks, drew loser and began to speak so softly that Jacky ad to watch her lips not to lose the words.

"I was asleep. I woke up and listened to ee if you were sleeping in your chair and I eard talking. Hush, don't answer! It was n the next room—the man and his wife—I eard them say 'Hamilton,' and that it 'looked s if we might be the girls in the paper.'"

Jacky's hands were clasped hard on her knee. ot a sound of reproach escaped her, though it ad been Gillian's carelessness that had let lip their real name when they took their room nd might ruin them now.

"He's going to tell the ponce we're here; she lidn't want him to, but he talked her round."

"Why?" breathed Jacky, and at Gillian's nswer her face contracted.

"Because there's a reward offered for who-ver killed Marchmont!"

"We didn't do it. It can't matter to us!" Jacky said, in a queer, strangled voice.

But Gillian only shook her head hopelessly. They could not prove their innocence. Marchmont was dead, and they need not look to Lesard for comfort.

She sat on the bed watching Jacky stuff their pitifully few belongings into their bag.

She dared not rise and help her, for fear of the added stir waking the sleepers whose snores came through the thin wall of the attic room. But the same unspoken thought was in her mind that was in Jacky's; they must be far away from this by the morning.

Today was Thursday; the woman was paid in advance till the end of the week! it was they who would lose, not she, by their flitting. But Gillian would have liked to leave all her small store of money on the table in gratitude. If it had not been for his wife, the man of the house would have told the police about them by this time. But six shillings was six shillings, and she dared not spare a penny. She bowed her head on her hands and did not see that Jacky sat writing something on some paper and envelopes found among Tom Hamilton's old papers that they had not dared to leave behind, and had had no chance to destroy. She had bought two stamps on her way home, and she put them on the letters, that she thrust into her pocket.

Toward one o'clock, when there was no passing in the street except for an occasional hansom, the two stole down-stairs in their stocking-feet and plunged into the darkness to a side street. As Gillian stooped to put on her shoes, Jacky leaned against a pillar post and lifted her hand. Something fell into the box with a dull flat sound, but Gillian noticed neither that nor the covert action. Furtive, cautious, glancing from side to side like hunted things, they slipped from one shadow to the next. Skirting dark houses, slinking swiftly past each gas-lamp, Tom Hamilton's daughters went out into the nightmare streets of London. Bad father as he had been, he must have turned in his grave had he seen them now, hurrying in the friendly darkness they knew not where.

When they had put a mile of winding streets between them and the house they had left, Jacky drew Gillian aside to where some half-built houses stood a little off the street.

"Gill, where are we going?" she said. "We can't go this way. We're getting into a suburb, and suburban people notice everything."

"I don't know where it would be any better." The flat, indifferent voice told Gillian's despair.

"Wait, sit down! We must think," said Jacky. And oh, if she had known where their thinking was to lead them!

The two sank down on a pile of bricks behind a boarding, scarcely daring to whisper lest a stray policeman might come around the corner, or a night watchman flash his lantern on their weary huddled figures. If they had known it they were safer on their pile of bricks than they had been for a week, for the street was up for repairs and absolutely deserted.

It had begun to rain, though, and the chill which comes before night verges to morning pierced their thin clothing. Jacky felt Gillian shiver.

"Come," she said authoritatively, "there's only one place for us to go. It mayn't be safe to stay there, but it's all we can do tonight."

"Where? We can't try to get a lodging at this time of night. No one would take us in."

"No one will know anything about us," coolly, "except one girl, and she's a good soul. I can make her do anything. Get up, Gill; we'll catch our deaths here! And it's idiotic when I have the latch-key of my old rooms in my pocket."

"Oh, Jacky! Dare we go there? They—they may be watching it."

"I don't see how they—if you mean the police—could know anything about it," thoughtfully. "No one at Hamilton Place knew where I lived, no chance policeman would think of a girl with smooth, red hair when he saw me going out and in. I believe we were fools not to go there at once. We needn't show up in the day, and six shillings will buy us food for a fortnight, if I go out after dark, when things are cheap. Come on. There's no sense in sitting here. If we're going to figure in the police reports"—with a bitter little smile Gillian could not see—"it can't be avoided by having pneumonia."

"If they do know anything about the rooms being yours," Gillian said almost joyfully, for Jacky's mood was catching, "by this time they must be pretty sure you aren't in them."

"They can't know any such thing. Oh, I wish my legs weren't so tired!"

"You were out before. I forgot that! Where did you go?"

"I went——" she stopped, afraid to go on. The less Gillian heard of Lesard the better. "I don't know exactly where I went," she finished lamely. "I wanted air. I couldn't breathe in that dirty garret. Hurry, Gill! We're miles out in West Kinsington, and we've got to get to Bloomsbury."

Through the quiet streets, back to the deserted thoroughfares where the only passers-by were men going home to comfortable beds, or ragged human wolves who had no beds to go to, the two girls hurried in silence; hand in hand, sometimes, when the terror of the streets, that is like no other terror, came on them.

A man spoke to them, and laughed as they ran by in silence. A dreadful old woman stopped their way and whined for money—cursing them when they did not answer. Gillian, to get the sound of that hoarse voice out of her ears, flung sixpence into the dirty hand.

"She was so old, and she was a woman," she said to excuse herself. Already the horror of London she had dreaded was upon her. Would Jacky and she ever turn into things like that just for want of a helping hand, a few beggarly coins? Better to die, than live a thing to shudder at! She held Jacky's hand for courage and hurried on.

Jacky trudged in silence, absorbed in fierce exultation at what she had done without telling Gillian. Surely God would help them, and not let them pay for Lesard's sins; and yet it seemed as if even in heaven there was neither thought nor pity for Tom Hamilton's daughters.

"Jacky, aren't we nearly there?" Gillian spoke for the second time, for Jacky was dead to outside things, and her impatient voice was loud in the quiet street.

Jacky looked round her searchingly. They were crossing the foot of the street where the Red Mouse lived, and a church clock somewhere was striking four. Startled, she quickened her pace.

"No, almost two miles," she returned. "I'm afraid the daylight will catch us."

The sweet, high voices that were so much alike, were clearly audible. A man, who had stopped just around the corner of the street they were crossing to turn up his trousers clear of the London mud, stood motionless at the sound. As the light steps passed on he stood up, careless that one immaculate trousers hem had not been rolled up like the other.

For one instant he listened to the quick fall of those girlish steps, and then dropped a newly lit cigar into the gutter before he went noiselessly, delicately in their wake.

Only a girl's voice in a silent street; and girls' voices were as like as two peas often enough. He might well be mistaken, and yet he knew he was not.

With easy, noiseless strides he kept drawing nearer to his unconscious quarry ahead. He was not Canadian born for nothing, had not spent years of his youth in the wilderness without learning how to track things he meant to kill. Under a street-lamp he saw those two fleeing figures, clearly, and knew one was Gillian and the other certain to be her sister; he quickened his pace, yet not enough to come up with them. Even he could not manage two girls in the open street.

And so he dogged them to the end of their journey, till they reached the door of the shabby old house in Blake Street that was all let out in rooms, of which the only caretaker was a slipshod old woman who cared nothing how her lodgers went and came so that their rent was paid. Most of her tenants were girls, and did their own cooking on oil-stoves; often their landlady did not know if they were there or not. Whether a locked door hid an empty room was nothing to her so long as her months' money clinked in her pocket.

The unseen watcher saw Jacky Hamilton fit her long-disused latch-key into the door and push her sister in. He had run them to earth, the only witnesses of what must never be told, and he moved close to the door to make sure of the number.

He could make his secret safe now, and he paused a moment gloating over it, then stepped back into the shadow of the next house quickly.

The door had opened again.

Jacky Hamilton had come out with sixpence in her hand to buy hot potatoes from a stall at the corner of the next street. For her rooms were empty, and a note left for her by her roommate said the latter was gone to do some work in the country. And breakfast Jacky must procure.

The man let her pass him, took a quick stride, and had her in his arms with one hand heavy on her mouth.

Dale's Commencement Gown

Milton Youngfoot, whom everyone was angling for, should come to her thus unsolicited.

He sat for a moment silent, sincere and earnest. Then he spoke, extending his hand: "May I, Miss Treadwell?"

The shapely hand was hers to take or disregard as she chose. He bound her by no promise, but he bound himself. It was very fair. She thrilled with his worthiness.

How could one resist such a man?

"I don't think a girl ever more sincerely said, "This is so sudden," Mr. Youngfoot." Dale turned to him and looked straight into his honest eyes, then placed her hand in his. "Melita has always given you the very highest rating, and a true gentlemen is never displeasing to a girl. I think I may give you the permission you crave."

but not least, he should love me as I should love him.

Do I hear someone say, "There is no one so near perfection as you describe." I believe there is and I don't believe I could ever be content with anything less. I prefer to live my life in single blessedness rather than marry the average man of today.

BROWNIE.

JET, OKLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am a wife and the mother of three children, a girl six, a boy eight and a foster daughter of sixteen. I have been a reader of COMFORT for a great many years and enjoy the Sisters' Corner immensely I am looking forward with interest to a lively discussion on our ideal husband. But sisters, let us remember and not expect our ideals to reach a higher standard than we ourselves are willing to measure up to. Now for my ideal. He should be a Christian, of good habits. He should have a good disposition and easy to get along with, willing to come half way if in so doing he need not sacrifice principle. He should be sympathetic when sympathy is needed also possess a certain sense of humor. My ideal should be a well read man and not lazy. And he must love children, and respect motherhood. Then, too, he should not be ashamed to be seen with his wife in public or become so negligent of her that he does not think of her pleasure and recreation as well as his own. He should not go off to lectures, shows, summer resorts, etc., by himself while she stays at home and cares for the kiddies. If both can't go at the same time, turn about is fair play. I also believe there is more agreement when the ages are nearly alike, though there are many ideal couples whose ages differ greatly.

MRS. ELLA MADELYN MILLER.

ANTHON, IOWA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Ruby Nelson has told about her ideal husband. I will tell of mine. I think I married my ideal man. My man is good natured, a good provider, a good father and an ideal husband. I think this talking about being near the same age is just in the way a person thinks. My husband is fourteen years older than I am but he doesn't show his age. When a person is cross and scolding all the time, that is what makes them old.

FATTIE.

LOGAN, OKLA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I was interested in Ruby Nelson's letter giving her qualifications for an ideal husband. I have a sort of mania for ideals, Ruby, and your ideal would pass my examination but in addition to these qualifications he must be large and strong, have regular features, beautiful auburn hair and velvety brown eyes. Also he must be an affectionate husband and father. And this wonderful man must be able to provide for me an ideal home, a modern bungalow somewhere in a beautiful mountainous country where I could have flower gardens, vegetables, a few pure-bred chickens, a Jersey cow, and anything I'd want for pets. But I'm wandering and had better come back to earth. But say, life would be one grand sweet song if I could have just such an earthly Paradise.

Of course there are many such ideal husbands who can and do furnish their wives with just what they desire but it has not been my good fortune to possess one. I've never met the man who would measure up to my standard of ideal, nor do I ever expect to.

No, good people, I shall not be a bachelor girl until I meet my ideal,—for I have a wonderfully good husband, even though he hasn't auburn hair and brown eyes and he just will smoke and say cuss words sometimes. But he has so many virtues I am very fond of him in spite of these facts. Our married life is almost equal to the domestic felicity of Mr. and Mrs. McVey, I say "almost" because judging from her letter, they never even so much as disagree, while I admit we do occasionally. I don't mean that we quarrel, we both hate that, we merely disagree. We've been married several years and are just as good friends and pals as ever and always shall be.

Lina Beck asks that the subject of dancing be discussed. A girl friend of mine who strayed from the straight and narrow way told me that she owed her downfall to the fact that her mother insisted she learn to dance. If one girl falls below the moral standard through dancing, is it not possible that many others will.

In my opinion, modern dances are degrading.

I am twenty-one and a half years of age, five feet, two inches tall, weigh about 110 pounds. Have an abbreviated crop of brown hair, grey eyes and a fair complexion.

MRS. C. W. RIDGEWAY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I expect Ruby Nelson has started something that will keep you busy, yet I feel sure you'll get lots of enjoyment from it too. And to swell the

THREE DIFFERENT HAND-MADE SPORT MODELS.

Knit a Sport Dress

TO knit a sport dress or skirt to go with a sweater is not such an undertaking as one might suppose, and it may be accomplished very successfully if one will bear in mind a few general directions.

First of all one must remember that a piece of material is being knitted instead of being cut to a particular shape. While the lines are very simple, still to secure a satisfactory result, your personal measurements must be considered, as knitwear will not look well if loose enough to be sloppy or tight enough to be too clinging.

As different weight wools and sizes of needles make considerable difference, and also the tension or way in which one works, the only safe rule to follow is to do a little experimenting with the materials selected, before starting the actual work. Although this involves a little time it will well repay one. Cast on some 30 to 40 sts and knit a few inches. If a pattern is new, work it out in this sample. Measure the work, counting the number of stitches to an inch and also to 6 or 12 inches. In this way can be found just the number of stitches needed for a given length.

In the three variations of hand-made models illustrated above, the first is simplicity itself, both in line and trimming.

The second features a one-piece garment, which gives the impression of a skirt and plain sweater.

An actually separate skirt and a sweater blouse, is shown in the third model.

Any of these are most convenient garments, suitable for any season, and admirably adapted to active sport or general use, as they are garments which will stand lots of hard wear.

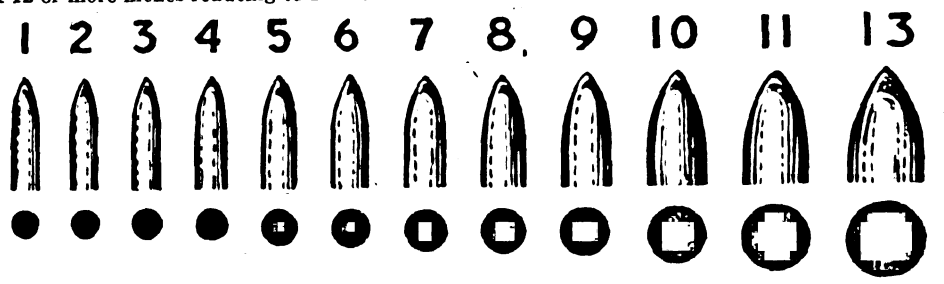
Knitted sweaters have become so indispensable that it is not surprising that from the making of them we have come to the making of whole frocks, which seem to bid fair to be equally as popular.

In going by the direction given also be guided by the measures of a one-piece dress which is a good fit, work all length shorter by from 1 to 2 inches to allow for stretching.

The needle gauge here shown will be a guide to size of needle used.

Model No. 1 is a combination of knitting and crocheting, made as follows:

Knitted One-Piece Sport Dress



Size 36 inches.

Materials. 24 ounces white silk and wool mixture (or any yarn weight of four-ply Germantown) 12 ounces each of Quaker grey and Bulgarian yellow Shetland floss, 1 pair celluloid needles No. 6, 1 pair No. 12 steel needles, 1 medium-size crochet hook.

Knitting should count 5 sts to the inch. Length of skirt 28 inches, length of dress 44 to 46 inches, one-half width of skirt at hem 28 inches.

Begin at bottom of back of skirt. Cast on 95 sts.

Knit plain garter st (k 1 row, p 1 row) until work measures 20 inches, or comes to one's hip line, allowing 5 inches for the crocheted border. At this point the width should be 22 or 24 inches, secured by knitting 2 sts tog at ends of both needles every 3 inches or so. K 12 or more inches reducing to 20-inch width.

AS NEEDLES, MADE BY MANY FIRMS ARE NUMBERED VERY DIFFERENTLY THERE IS NO STANDARD NEEDLE GAUGE, BUT THE SIZE AS GIVEN ABOVE WILL BE A GUIDE TO THE WORKER.

For arm-size; on next row bind off 5 sts, k across, bind off last 5 sts, next row the same, then decrease 1 st each end every row until 10 sts have been taken off each side.

From arm-size point knit until work measures 6 inches. Then on the 60 or so sts on needles k 15 sts, slip on holder, bind off 30 or more sts for neck, k last 15 sts, k on 15 sts for 9 inches for right front. The neck is purposely left large to allow for the crocheted border.

In next row on the center edge cast on 25 sts for square neck, keep this edge straight. On opposite edge for arm-size cast on 1 st at end of each row until 12 sts have been added. Next 2 rows cast on 5 sts. From here knit to hip line increasing as necessary. From the under arm points work until front equals the back. Bind off loosely.

Pick up stitches on left shoulder and same number of rows to where 25 sts were cast on the right side, then increase on arm-size as on right and on center edge increase 1 st every other row until 5 sts have been added.

On under arm seam increase as on right side, knit to length and bind off.

Sleeves

Pick up 75 sts around arm-size, k and p for 2 inches. Then k 2 sts tog, at each side, every 2 inches until 60 sts remain for a short sleeve or 52 for a long sleeve. Finish long sleeve by ribbing on the steel needles. Crochet roll back cuff to match border.

Short sleeve should just be finished with crochet band or roll back cuff as preferred.

To Press Knitted Work

After knitting is completed pin out, right side down onto a clean sheet, cover with a damp cloth and press lightly or steam by holding iron as near as possible. Leave in position until thoroughly dry. Seam up carefully.

Border

With gray wool, beginning at bottom corner of left-hand side, on the right side, work 1 row of singles around the bottom, up the left front, making 3 s c in each corner st around the neck and down to the starting point.

With yellow wool beginning in the same place work all around, always working 3 sts in the bottom and top corner of the left front, and skipping the corner stitches of the 3 inside corners of the square neck. Work down the left front to a point 5 inches before where left front meets right, ch 1, turn. Work back to starting point, ch 1, turn.

Repeat until 4 rows are completed, in 5th row, 4 inches from top of square neck, ch 5, skip 5 s c, work 7 s c, ch 5, skip 5 s c. Continue around to starting point. Work 9 rows of yellow, then 9 rows of grey. See detail of border and also crocheted buttons on next page.

Girdle

With yellow ch 7, turn. 6 s c, ch 1, turn. Repeat until 38 inches or more, after last row. Ch 6, 1 s c on opposite edge, turn, cover ch with singles and fasten securely. On opposite end of belt sew button.

Buttons

Using gray wool crochet circles large enough to cover 1½ wooden mold. With white wool work lazy-daisy stitches from the center, finishing with yellow centers. See illustration No. 2 on opposite page.

The model sketched in No. 2 has a skirt of block design, combined with a plain waist, which is relieved by an effective girdle and neck and sleeve finish, shown in detail on the opposite page.

Janet Tennis Jumper

16 to 18 year size.

Materials. 40 ounces white Shetland floss, 4 ounces yellow floss, 2 pair celluloid needles size 4, 1 fine crochet hook.

Length of skirt 28 inches, total length from shoulder 44 inches.

For one-half of skirt—knitting should count 5 sts to inch. Cast on 120 sts. K 1 row through back loops, then for right side work.

2nd row—K 5, * p 2, k 10, repeat from * to end of row.

3rd row—Knit plain.

4th row—Same as 2nd row.

Repeat these 2 rows until 7 ridges are complete.

A new pattern is always started on the wrong side, or after a row of knitting.

For second pattern, k 12, * p 2, k 10, repeat from* to end of row.

Next row knit plain.

Repeat these 2 rows until 7 ridges are complete.

This completes border of the skirt.

1st row of block pattern of skirt, see detail No. 1 on next page. K 5, p 11, * k 11, p 11, repeat from *. Knit back. Repeat these 2 rows until 5 ridges are complete. Then k 3 rows.

2nd block pattern, k 8, p 11, * k 11, p 11, repeat from *. Repeat these 2 rows until 5 ridges are complete. K 3 rows.

3rd block pattern. K 11, p 11, repeat. Complete the blocks the same as before.

4th block pattern—P 2, * k 11, p 11, repeat from *. Complete blocks.

5th block pattern—P 5, * k 11, p 11, repeat from *. Complete blocks.

6th block pattern—P 8, * k 11, p 11, repeat from *. Complete blocks.

7th block pattern—P 11, k 11, repeat. Complete blocks.

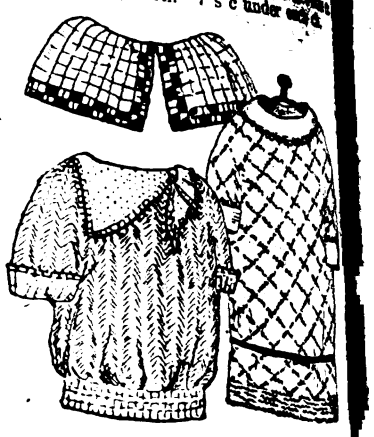
8th block pattern—K 2, * p 11, k 11, repeat from *. Complete blocks.

9th block pattern—Same as 1st blocks.

Knit in this way repeating pattern until work measures 24 inches. Work front of the skirt in the same way but 2 blocks narrower. Seam together.

To Knit to Jumper

Cast on 75 sts, work 14 rows plain. Then k 1 row, p 1 row for 16 inches. Work over 25 sts, bind off 25 sts for the neck, 25 sts, slip last 25 sts on a holder.



Knit on 25 sts for 3 inches, then cast st at neck end of every other row until have been added. K other side to this slip on one, complete the front, edge knitted border. Sew skirt and jumper

Sleeves

Pick up 70 sts, k and p. Reduce total length of knitting on sleeve 6 inches

Edging of Neck and Sleeves

On the wrong side of edge of 1 row of singles using white floss. Work 1 row of spaces. Ch 5, turn. second space, ch 5, skip 1 sp, 1 s c repeat. Next row 7 s c under each yellow ch 5, 1 s c in center of 4 s c Ch 5, repeat, turn. 7 s c under each

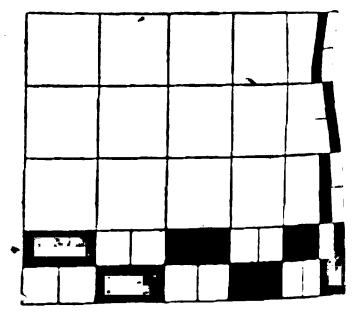
CROCHETED BERTHA, WOOL-DARNED AND DIAMOND OPEN-WORK SWEATER.

Work another row each of white and yellow chains. See pattern in detail. The neck is finished with 1 row of 1 row of white chains and 1 row of chains.

Girdle

Braid several strands of yellow wool the ends in the front and run through made as follows:

With white ch 9, join. Filling with Join. 1 round of singles of yellow, of singles of white, 1 round of yellow, ends of the girdle with tassels.



In model No. 3 both the skirt and separate blouse slip-on are trimmed bands of plain knitting.

There might be any one of several combinations used in such a design or mixture of wool and silk of yellow, black and white, green and two shades of one color work up very effectively.

A separate skirt in this novelty knit would most useful as it can be used with slip-ons.

Sport Skirt and Blouse Sweater

Materials. 20-22 ounces Shetland 1 pair No. 2 and 1 pair No. 4 celluloid

DETAIL OF DESIGN USED IN CROCHETED BERTHA

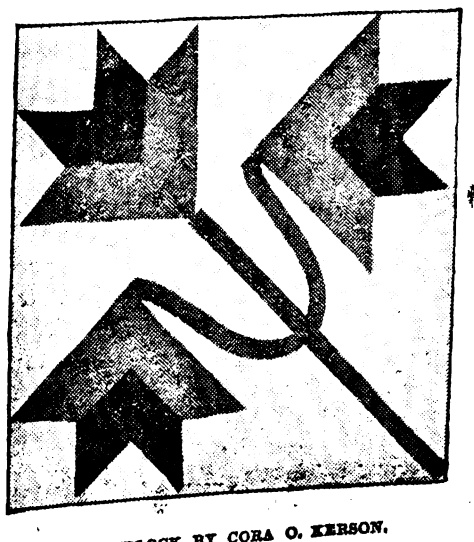
The skirt is made in 2 pieces of No. 4 Length of skirt 28 inches, width of one inches.

Begin at bottom of back of the skirt casting on 108 sts.

1st row—Knit plain.

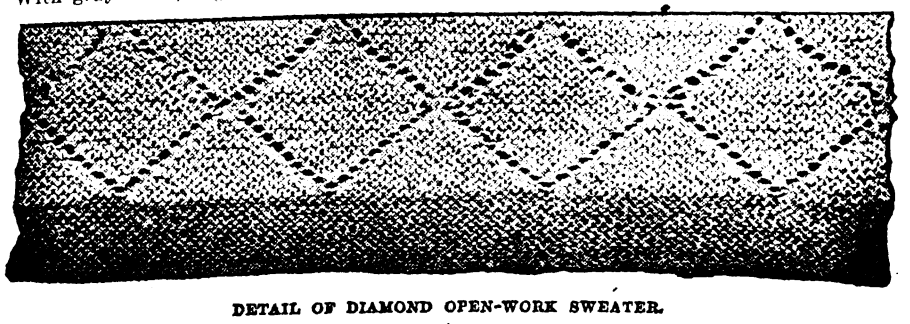
2nd row—K 5 sts, p 2 sts, * k 10 sts, p repeat from * 7 times, ending with k

Repeat these 2 rows until 15 ridges rows are complete. After knitting a start the second pattern.



1st row—K 4 sts, p 2 sts, * k 10 sts, p repeat from *.

2nd row—Knit plain. Repeat these 2 rows for 15 ridges. Then repeat the first pattern. After the 3 blocked border, k 1 row, p 1 row until skirt measures 24 inches. On needles knit a 2-inch band of ribbing of p 2 sts, bind off.



Make the front of the skirt in the same way. Press out and seam up, being careful to match the border as accurately as possible.

55th row—K 9 sts, * o, k 3 tog, o, k 17 sts. Repeat from * as usual, k 3 tog, o, k 9 sts.

The pattern is now complete. Repeat from the 21st row until the back is from 12 to 14 inches according to length desired. Cast on 30 sts on each side from short, or 60 for long sleeves.

Knit one and one-half diamonds for width of sleeve.

Shoulder

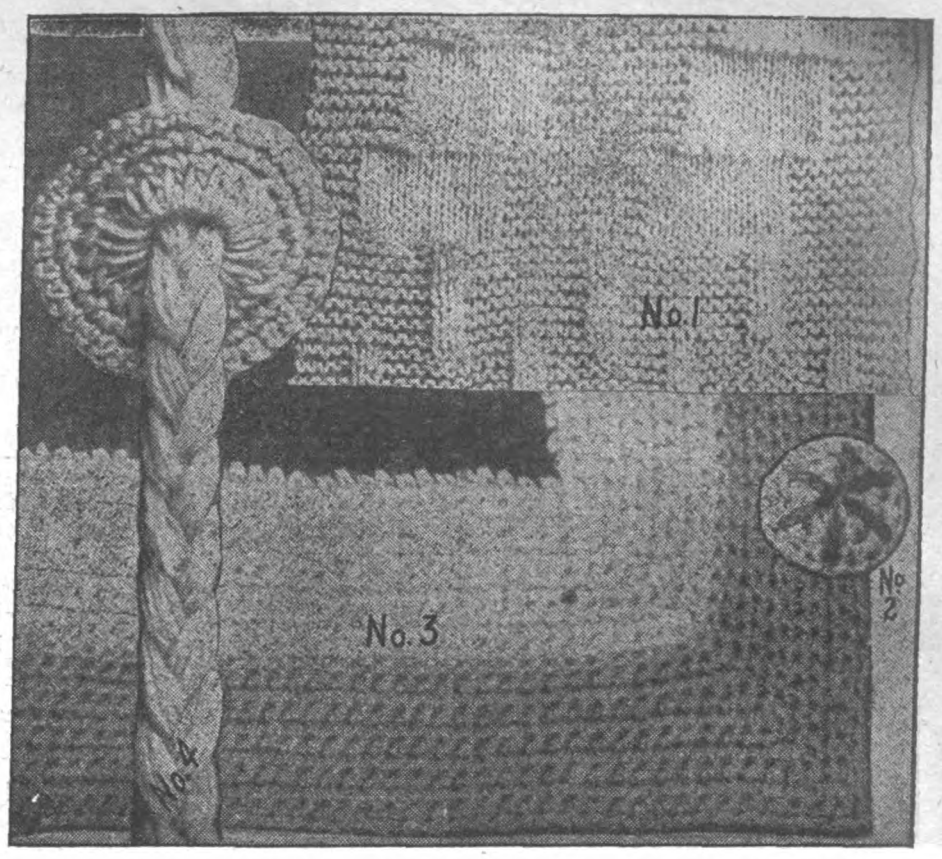
Fold and mark center of the back. From bottom of a sleeve work to within 17 sts of center, slip these sts, the center st and 17 sts more (35) on a pin. Knit the remaining, work back, cast on 35 sts, work to end of row. Knit one and one-half diamonds to complete sleeves. Bind off the number of stitches cast on for sleeves.

Knit front to correspond with back, finishing with border of color in plain knitting. Bind off neck. Slip stitches on back at neck on needles, bind off 1, on 34 sts, k 2 sts, p 2 sts for 6 rows. Bind off easily. Pick up 38 sts on front of neck, p 2 sts, k 2 sts for six rows, bind off, join at either side to ribbing of the back.

Wool-Darned Blouse

For this novel little slip-on one will need two yards of white point de-esprit, which is a finely dotted net, one ball of blue, pink or canary Shetland floss, a darning needle and bone crochet hook.

To avoid unnecessary darning, lay a blouse pattern on the net and indicate the outline with a colored baste thread, then just the portion to be used need be worked.



The net is dotted in rows with the dots alternating rather than opposite each other. To make the method of work clear, consider these in the first row numbered 1, 3, 5, and in the second row 2, 4, 6 etc.

Using a couple of yards of wool, start darning by working under dot No. 1 in first row, cross diagonally and work under dots 4 and 6 in second row, then back and under dots 3 and 5 in first row, under dots 6 and 8 in second row, back and under dots 7 and 9 in first row. Repeat working in this way which results in a row of diagonal stitches of wool on the right side of the net.

Be very careful in darning not to pull the wool too tight and neither should it be loose, but just of easy tension which will lie flatly on the material.

In the second row as will be seen in detail of diagram, notice that the stitches are run in at an angle to those in the first row.

Beginning to work as in the first row, run under dot No. 1 in third row of dots, cross and work under dots 4 and 6 in second row, then back and under dots 3 and 5 in third row. Repeat. The third row is the same as the first row, working under dots in the third and fourth rows on the net.

After the darning is completed, pull the net evenly and pin edge out, right side up, on a sheet.

See that the wool stitches are not too loose or tight in place. Turn net over and press under a damp cloth.

Make up, full bottom of blouse, bind with net. Work a wool band for the bottom as follows: Ch 28 sts, turn. 1 d c in 8th st from hook, ch 2, skip 2, 1 d c, 5 more sps, ch 5, turn. Repeat making sps over sps until band is of sufficient length. Join ends together and sew in place. Finish the bottom with 1 row of singles with ch 3 picot in every other space.

The handkerchief collar which is half of a 24-inch square of the net, undarned, and the up turning ruffles on the sleeves, having a finish of the wool. Crochet one row of spaces into the net, after first turning the edges and whipping with wool. Follow spaces with one row of singles and ch 3 picot in every other space.

Little Girl's Knitted Coat

Three-year size

Materials required. Five to six balls Scotch knitting, one pair No. 5 needles, one pair No. 12 steel needles.

Size—Length of coat about 18 inches, length of sleeves, 8½ inches.

Cast on 70 to 75 sts for bottom of back which should measure without stretching about 18 inches. K 3 rows plain.

4th row—K 9 sts, p 4 sts, k 4 sts, p 4 sts, k 33 sts, p 4 sts, k 4 sts, p 4 sts, k 9 sts.

5th row—K plain.

Repeat these 2 rows decreasing 1 st at the end of each needle in every 20th row, until 65 sts remain on needles. Work until back measures 18 inches.

Shoulder

K 22 sts. Bind off 21 sts for the neck, k 22 sts, turn. K 4 sts, p 4 sts, k 4 sts, p 4 sts, k 6 sts.

Alternate knit purled and plain rows for one inch, then increase 1 st at the end of each row on the front or center edge of the coat until 15 sts have been added. Knit all stitches excepting the two purled strips of 4 sts each. Work until front measures 4 inches from the neck line, then on the seam edge of the front, casting on 1 st at the end of every other row until 6 stitches have been added for the arm-hole.

Make front one-half inch longer than back and bind off loosely.

Work the second side to correspond.

Sleeves

Holding the right side of the back towards one, 4 inches below the shoulder, pick up 1 st between each ridge, along the edge, to the under-arm edge of the right front. K plain for 2 inches, then decrease 1 st every 3rd ridge until 32 sts remain.

Cuffs

With steel needles rib for 5 inches by k 2, p 2, bind off easily.

Collar

Holding wrong side of coat toward you, pick up 22 sts across back of the neck, k 2 rows, pick up 4 sts on the front, k across, pick up 4 sts on opposite front. Turn. Knit back, pick up 2 sts, k across, pick up 2 sts.

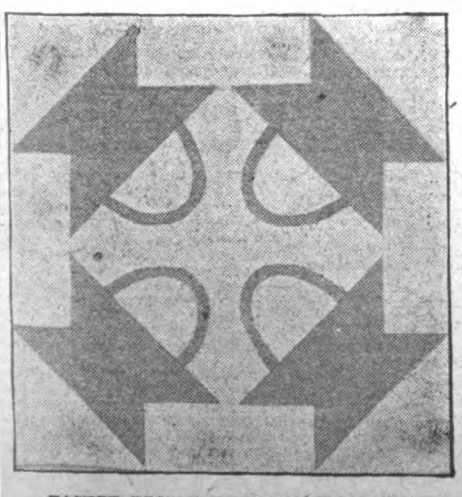
Continue to pick up 2 sts, or more sts, on each side if the collar is growing too wide until the edge of the front is reached. Bind off very loosely so edge of collar will not pull.

Plan to finish on the edge of the right-hand front, then without breaking wool, with crochet hook, ch 5, 1 s c in edge, turn, fill ch with singles, fasten off securely.

Five inches below make a second buttonhole loop.

Buttons

Crochet over button-molds or make knitted square of k 1 row, p 1 row large enough to cover molds, as preferred.



Collar rolls back and cuffs turn up half way, after coat has been sewed up on the sides.

Crocheted Openwork Scarf

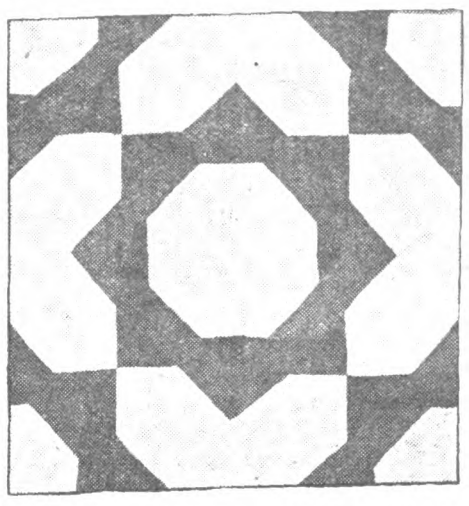
See Illustration on Page 15

A very attractive summer scarf can be rapidly made of odds and ends of bright wool which have such a way of accumulating.

This is just the season to work up all your scraps as vivid color combinations are the style.

The scarf is of crocheted strips of shells with chains between as shown in illustration.

These strips may be each of one color throughout, or of a combination of different short length. If the latter, knot your wools arranging the colors, then in working, try to have all knots come in the shells, then the ends can be nicely covered.



Begin a strip by ch 15, turn. 1 shell of 5 d c in 5 st from hook. Ch 7, 1 shell 3rd st from end, 1 d c in first st, turn. 1 shell on 3rd d c of 2nd shell, ch 7, 1 shell on shell, 1 d c under beyond shell, ch 3, turn. Repeat until work is 50 to 55 inches.

Make 5 strips for a scarf, join by crocheting together with black wool, by working singles under chs beyond shells. Finish the ends with tied-in fringe.

A Good Quilt-Making Suggestion

From a Westerner's long and interesting letter we are glad to be able to quote the following good ideas. She says:

"In our household we always have several quilts as we say, on the go for where there are several girls there is sure to be many scraps which can be utilized to advantage.

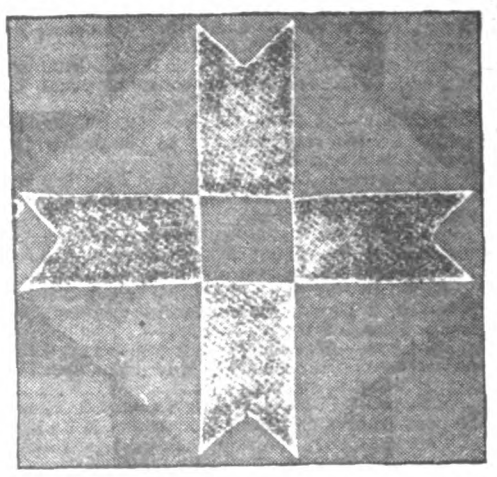
"Being interested in patchwork I have throughly enjoyed the many artistic and historic patterns which COMFORT has given us the past few months.

"Quilting is an art which the modern girls should, and I find would be interested in, if mothers would take the same amount of time and patience in teaching that our mothers did.

"So I suggest that a little girl's first lesson in plain sewing be on a simple patch.



"Give her a four-block square, two blocks of her light apron and two of her dark dress and note how anxious she is to finish it at one sitting. "Help her to calculate how many squares will be required for a quilt top for her bed. "Children really love to accomplish something and 'I help my girls to plan out ways and means. If a certain piece of work drags, suggest using plain squares between.

CAKE BASKET BY MRS. ANNA WALTERS.

"Even boys I think can be interested in quilts. If they want to run your machine just to see it go give them something to go on. They will accomplish something, if not, then have them let the machine alone. This scheme does not always work I admit as sometimes wasted time turned to account loses its charm.

"Quilt making in youth, is a putting together many memories as well as materials, which in after years bring back to us a flood of thoughts of other days. So I love the work for what it is and what it suggests; each old quilt stirs so many memories that they truly are priceless.

"A quilt and COMFORT lover. "Mrs. J. Behrend."

Comfort Sisters' Corner

pile of letters a little more. I'm going to tell you sisters about my ideal man (so far undiscovered). First, of course, he should be a Christian, but my sermons I get from the biggest church of all, the great outdoors and Mother Nature. So it would please me much if the Ideal Man was a student of Mother Nature, and to be my ideal he must be. Art, music and the greatest lessons are taught there, we have only to study and understand.

Yes, he would be a teetotaler, never chew or smoke cigarettes, but one picture I see in my mind's eye, is a cozy old fireplace, an overstuffed rocker, comfortable slippers and a pipe! Another is books, books, books, well used and the best, also a violin and piano looking as though they were accustomed to daily use. To me the ideal man is a lover of good literature and a musician. In fact, Ruby Nelson's ideal just about fits mine, not lazy, not overambitious, but yet able to support a wife and family easily enough that business worries would not make him cross and irritable. I don't admire a sissy but it is a pleasnt sight to see a man who is clean and neat. A man who is kind and gentle with animals and who loves birds is one to be trusted.

You dear people who have read Gene Stratton Porter's "Harvester" and "Laddie" know the sort of man who is my ideal. Don't throw up your hands and say "Impossible", for there is nothing that is impossible to be or become if one has the will power and brains. The sermon "Harvester" preached to those doctors was what I call "the essence of right living and thinking." No matter what a man works at, where he lives or who he is, if he is a "Harvester" or a "Laddie" then he is my ideal man. Some people may say he is just a man in a book and books are not true to real life. Right here I differ. Some people in books are impossible but I have yet to find one in Gene Stratton Porter's books that is impossible. She peoples her books with the finest, big-hearted, most understanding, lovable people ever could be. I would rather read her sermons any day than go to church and hear some of the ministers of today for Mrs. Porter teaches all things necessary to a Christian life.

I think it is our mutual likes that draw us together in more perfect harmony with one another. It seems that sometimes people let worry and trouble take all the fun and joy out of life. I like to see folks who can be jolly most any time. What we are counts most and what we look like is going to have a lot to do with folks' opinion of us, so it's a pity to spoil our looks, don't you think so?

I am just a plain country woman, five feet, nine inches tall and weigh about 175 pounds. Have black hair, brown eyes and a more or less tanned complexion, but I do not try to cover it with paint or powder, at least, not very much powder. I love fresh air and I fancy my skin likes to get some of it too.

I am one of the unfortunates though that is separated from the far from ideal man. I don't believe in marrying carelessly and then getting a divorce if we don't get along well. Personally, I prefer one happy, contented marriage, but fate sometimes, and youth very often, makes quite a mess of things.

LILLIAN PENNYWELL.
STANBERRY, MISSOURI.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for a score or more of years but never found courage to write until I read Ruby C. Nelson's letter about the ideal husband. We agree on all points except my ideal—whom I married, of course—he doesn't care so much about books and hasn't a college education, but our religion and politics are the same. He the same care-free boy I married, twenty years never too tired or busy to be jolly. I made great mistake to marry a man to reform him, ward. I used to think my ideal did not exi most of the young men of my acquaintance smoked, or swore, or were indifferent as to the of company they kept, or did not care for relig were cruel or sissies, perhaps shallow brained too high tempered. My mind was made up an old maid until one day a fine, clean, Chris young man of portly build and honest, steady came along and I was completely swept off feet. After a courtship of two years, during I learned to idolize him for his sterling char we were married, and are lovers still. In twenty years we have never had a quarrel. notonous, did someone say? Don't you think Despite misfortune, illness and the thousand one things that we have had to contend with have always said "Good night" with no shadow ill to mar our perfect happiness.

Washing Fluid.—Dissolve one ounce of sal of Tartar, one ounce of carbonate of ammonia, ten-cent package of borax and a ten-cent can lye in a gallon of water. I use one-half cup of fluid to a tub of water. Soak the clothes over night.

Place a folded Turkish towel beneath your broidered doilies and similar articles when ironing and the pattern will be brought out, better.

When shaking rugs, take both ends firmly your hands and there will be no whipping out ravelling.

If you are a young mother and dread giving baby his bath, try this plan. Place two large pillows on table, near the center, cover with rubber cloth or oilcloth, then with folded, warm quilt. Nearby place two basins of water, soap, powder, towels, change of clothing, etc., and give baby his bath on table instead of holding in your lap.—Mrs. A. H. Warrell, Foster Falls, Virginia.

I covered the shelf where I cook and wash dishes with a piece of metal roofing. This is much better than oil cloth.

This is how I fix my fireplace. In the spring after the fires are out, brush down all soot and clean interior of fireplace, then wash it with a mixture of lime and water, colored with red ink to give a pinkish tint. On special occasions I adorn with a potted plant or a large bouquet of flowers.—Mrs. Annie Cravey, Green Bay, Ala.

When ants are troublesome in the cupboard, use oil of sassafras, applied by feather or small brush to edge of lower shelf. The odor is not unpleasant and is strong enough to keep ants away for a couple of weeks.

Paint the interior of your henhouse with coal tar and you will be rid of mites. This drives them so do not let chickens in while it is wet or it will blister their feet.

Always shrink gingham before making up. Soak in salty water and hang up to dry without wringing.

In washing wool or silk, never hang in the sunshine to dry as the sun causes it to turn yellow. Wash silk, roll up and put away a few hours before ironing.

White cotton goods that have become yellow may be bleached by soaking in water containing one tablespoonful of cream of tartar to one quart of water. Then put in the sunshine. Either lemon juice and salt or cream of tartar and salt, moistened and rubbed on rust spots and the cloth laid out in the bright sunshine, will remove rust spots. Sometimes a couple of applications are necessary.

Tribulations of Tourists in Europe

By Eugene Crowther

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ARE you going to Europe?

If you are, here are a few notes from my own recent experiences:

The main thing is the passport. It is the best friend and the biggest nuisance in the world. It has to be guarded as the most valuable possession. With it one can wade through the maize of red tape of the big and petty governments that infest the Continent; without it, one is stuck. In the latter case, our old friend (?), the American Consul, may prove a friend in need. If, after using the tactics of a Philadelphia lawyer, one succeeds in convincing him that the passport was actually lost, one may be favored with an emergency passport.

Another combination of friend and nuisance is baggage. The less, the better. If it were not for being called a tramp, I should be tempted to travel on the Continent baggage-free, that is, without any at all, except perhaps what my pockets would hold.

Two favorite pastimes of the high and mighty petty officials whose duty it is to carefully scrutinize every victim who has the temerity to go from one country to another consists in seeing if they cannot have the thrill of detecting something wrong with a passport, or finding some forbidden article. (If they find several things of this character, their elation baffles description.) I often wonder what they do with the big, fat Havana cigars which they confiscate. There is such a gleam of delight in their eyes on such occasions, that I am tempted to believe that the cigars go the same route as those of a father who has several boys in high school. The supreme delight of these minor dignitaries consists in keeping a train standing a couple of hours on each side of the border, while the harassed tourists wait for their passports to get decorated with more rubber stamps, and wonder if they are ever going to get the precious documents back again.

And how they expect people to travel without money is beyond me. Ever since I saw them take five hundred good American dollars from a fat individual without giving him a signed receipt, I have been glad I brought traveler's checks along, even if it is a nuisance to find someone with brains enough to accept them. I saw the fat individual about three weeks later.

"Have you recovered your money yet?" I inquired.

"Not a penny," he replied. "Our Legation told me they thought they could recover it in a few weeks; that the ordinary routine in foreign governments required about six months for anything to get through; but they hoped to get it done quicker through direct channels."

I should be gorgeously decorated for having slain so many European bedbugs. The hotel owners are very ungrateful. I had to bribe them for the privilege. They can afford to be independent. For every room there are a dozen applicants. Elegant people are often found in third-rate hotels, because it is either that or the park-bench.

Pocketbooks will soon go out of fashion in several countries. They have only paper money in circulation and it is becoming so worthless that it may become necessary to carry it around in baskets. I heard of a Swiss brewer who economized by dispensing with the usual printed labels for his bottles and substituting Austrian one-crown notes.

I am not a pessimist, but it does make one feel "fed-up" after having stood in line for a train-seat, standing room in a street-car, and a theater ticket, to have to wait an hour in a restuarant before the man in dress-suit finally succeeds in getting the cook to understand what them "furreners" want, and ventures in with a bowl of dishwater which he calls soup.

Please don't take me for a confirmed grouch, for I am planning to take another trip when my nerves get soothed sufficiently.

Note.—Mr. Crowther is in the Diplomatic Service of the United States, and at present is attached to the American Legation at Belgrade, capital of Jugo Slavia.—EDITOR.

Easter Wedding in Mid-Ocean

Copyright by Underwood & Underwood, N. Y.

Now they're calling the S. S. President Polk, of the United States Lines, "the Honeymoon Special", for two "deep-sea weddings" have taken place aboard it.

This photo shows the marriage, on Easter Sunday, 1923, of Mr. Bart Doyle, of Old Orchard, Maine, and Miss Edith Lockhart, of England, with Captain W. L. McLean, skipper of the Polk, reading the service.

After the marriage a new flag was flown by the vessel—a "honeymoon banner" consisting of two huge red hearts transfixed by a red Cupid's arrow, on a white ground.

Comfort's League of Cousins

We came here from Texas so we could own a home, as land was cheap here. Land that cost $12 to $15 an acre will grow much finer strawberries, fruit and truck than the $200 land of Texas. We live in the foothills of the beautiful southern Ozarks and have many springs of soft water and such nice fish. If you will come down this summer, we will go fishing on Rolling Fork river, which is one of the most beautiful mountain streams in Arkansas.

We live in the adjoining county to the largest peach orchard in the world. Listen, cousins: Arkansas has the largest single spring in the world, one of the most luxurious bath houses in the world, the largest canning factory in the world, and the most beautiful state capitol in the world. This last was built in 1826 and is said to be one of the finest examples of Doric architecture in the U. S. Arkansas grows almost every conceivable fruit that can be grown in the temperate zone. Arkansas takes first place in apples, both as to quality and quantity, and has won first prize with these at all great expositions for the past twenty years. Out of the 10,000 acres of canteloupes that are grown in Arkansas, Sevier county in which we live produces almost half. Uncle, if you could eat one fresh from the vine, I know you would agree with Commissioner Ferguson who, s id: "Ripened in the sunshine of an Ozark summer, the Arkansas canteloupe needs only to be sliced in half and sprinkled with crushed ice to make a feast fit for a king—two kings! The flavor of its rich yellow meat combines the sweetness of the strawberry with the lusciousness of the peach,—suggesting a dash of grape fruit and pinches or rare spices. It is both a food and a delicacy, the most pleasing, welcome and nourishing of all breakfast fruits."

No, I will not describe myself or tell my age—since I will vote in the next presidential election.

Everybody be good and some one please write to me, as I get lonely.

Lovingly your niece and cousin,

MAUDE PARKER.

All right, Maude, you fooled your Other Uncle! Here's your Hymn of Arkansas plain as print I think you are a darn good speller in spite of all your Other Uncle may say. I'll bet this Other Uncle isn't nearly as nice a relative as I am.

I wish you hadn't written so enthusiastically about Arkansas, Maude. I had just got my mind all settled as to living in Missouri, when here you come and get it all unsettled again with your alluring statistics. Think of having the largest single spring in the world on which to rest one's mattress and vertebræ! I always find the springs too narrow on most single beds. Then, after a morning tub in the finest of bath mansions, I could have for my breakfast, 365 days in the year, a big, luscious, spicy, icy, Arkansas canteloupe. Gosh, Maudie, but it looks bad for Missouri just now. Do you think you could stand two Uncles in De Queen? But perhaps I can compromise and build my house right across the state line—spending my mornings in Arkansas and my afternoons in Missouri. I would have to be in your state for breakfast, of course, or how could I sink my teeth in a juice-drowning, Ozark-ripened, Sevier county globe of lusciousness! What are the prices of building lots, with fishing rights, along the Rolling Fork river, Maude? I may want to roll in some day, and if I should read your letter over once more I'd probably start rolling at once.

SOMEWHERE IN TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Have just finished reading the last issue of COMFORT and it was impossible to resist answering the many interesting letters on our good old page. Especially Cousin Jeff's appeal for a chance for us brunette readers to express our intellectual ideas, which same I have been trying to impress on Uncle Lisha for lo! how many years? Now Uncle, please don't squelch me so completely this time even if my effort is rather a sorry one, for the order was for brunettes, and, as O. Roy Cohen says, "among which I am whom." This is about my seventh letter, so you see I am nothing if not persistent.

Cousin Ruth is all right! When I read her letter I felt like saying, "Them's my sentiments, sister." Gus and Jack are not really as disgusted with the feminine population of our United States as their recent attacks would indicate. They are only misguided—only misguided. I think they were temporarily soured on girls in general as the result of the unreasonableness of some one girl in particular. True they may have had a sneaky suspicion 'way down in their hearts that all was not well with a goodly (or badly?) portion of the unfair sex, but would have kept right on saying nothing if some gentle little thing hadn't trampled all over tender feelings and caused them to hop right into a rage and flay us all so recklessly. Personally I was as amused as Cousin Ruth and didn't get the least bit angry, for, says I, if a fellow can't express his true feelings on the page its purpose will have been defeated, and besides, when one has up that much steam it has to be blown off or something is going to bust!

Uncle Lisha, when my COMFORT arrives the first place I turn to is the Cousins' Page, and the first thing I read is your editorial before I even glance at the letters.

In my late lamented letter, whose tomb was Uncle Lisha's own waste-basket, I told of a 400-mile, cross-Texas trip that I made all by myself in an automobile last June, but it must have been too exciting for print, for it did not pass muster at the Desk. I had another experience that I meant to tell—about being lost all night on a lonely, strange beach; in a wet bathing suit and nothing else. This was on the Texas coast near Point Isabel where the wilderness of prairie-grass, cactus and mesquite grow down almost to the water's edge. I nearly froze to death, though it was July, but the worst was that I was frightened out of my wits. The coyotes howled entirely too close for my peace of mind, and the seabirds cried and circled and cried. Maybe I cried a little myself, but I'm not telling. The moon helped out all she could by shining her brightest, but it was the dear old sun I longed most to see. When dawn came I wasn't nearly so badly lost as I thought. A searching party in a Ford found me, alive and whole, when the best they expected was my mangled remains. Then someone wants to know how come that gray hair on my fair temple and I only twenty-one years old last month!

My description to prove I'm brunette before I go. Maybe I am robust enough for Cousin Jeff! I am five feet, seven inches tall; weigh a hundred and thirty-five pounds and wear size five shoes. My hair is black, of the type known as "patent-leather hair" when it is smoothly brushed; eyes, dark brown; complexion that would be called olive in fiction, but which I call just plain tan. All the olives I ever saw were green, anyhow, so I prefer some other shade, myself. I love games and outdoor sports, music and everything nice. In fact I am quite normal in most ways. Now I'll tell you what I am and what I want to be. I am a telephone operator, and—oh, hush laughing now, and let me finish, or I'll argue with you all day! My ambition is to write. Short stories and poems occupy my spare time pretty well, but I have never given an editor the chance to send me his nicely regretful rejection slip yet. For I know enough to admit what I can't do anything worth while until my education is more complete and all the other things that a successful author must have. My father says I have talent in that direction, but he may be a trifle prejudiced, seein' as how I'm the only one of his five daughters that resembles him in appearance and tastes, (we are both "book-worms").

Your niece and cousin,

GRACE CASAL.

Grace, you shake a lively typewriter and it surely is a shame you had to wiggle the keys until the lucky seventh time before I would take any notice. Now I wonder if I really have been showing partiality to blondes as Cousin Jeff boldly declared! Mebbe I have, but I know I didn't mean to; honest Injun, I didn't. Anyway hair is so variable nowadays that it is a wise man who keeps an open mind and color card. I shall try and do this in the future.

I'm deeply grieved, Grace, that you got so much lost in the frigid Texas climate that your hair turned a bit gray from wandering about and crying with the seabirds and coyotes. But by being so robust a brunette, of the true Cousin Jeff Brand, you see you survived the experience and proved yourself difficult to lose. One of those little pocket edition blondes might have been gnawed by coyotes and sand fleas long ago.

You have the correct idea, Grace. If you want to write, read and learn all that you can, so that you may have an inner well from which to draw. For your reading stick to the best that has been thought and said—the best thought said in the best way. Hold a lively, observing interest in men and things and keep a human sympathy always bubbling above your lavalliere. Gain enough of the technique of the game to express what you have to say correctly—and then go to it and write. If you have anything in your mental well worth bringing to the surface it will come out. And it will help you to be persistent enough not to mind rejection slips and to knock even to seven times—just as you have at the door behind which I have enjoyed your other letters—which Billy positively devoured with deep admiration.

PEEBLES, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I have been reading the interesting letters of the cousins in COMFORT—which I have been borrowing, but now I have a chance to write, and maybe read, one of my own. To be brief about it: I have joined the League.

I live on a farm just two miles from the famous Serpent Mound, one of the great works of the Mound Builders, so if some of the cousins will write to me, I'll give them all the news about the mound.

For my own description: I am sixteen years old, five feet, ten inches in height; have brown hair, clear blue eyes—and am Irish from head to foot. I am a junior in high school and have spent six weeks in college.

Now, cousins, don't be backward and forget about me away down here in the jungle. Just write me a letter and see if I will not answer it!

Your new nephew,

JACK MASON.

Jack, we are glad to be joined by one of the original Mound Builders—even if you refuse to tell us anything about that old Earth Serpent which was shovelled together so many centuries ago. Science doesn't seem to know just why the big mound was built, but, shucks! there are lots of things we are building now that scientists of a few thousand years ahead will have to puzzle over. So that makes it square Some Professor Adolphus Doodlebury, in the year 4689, perhaps, will dig up some well-preserved Ford and decide that it may be the skeleton of a mammoth Armored Land Crab.

For your father's sake, Jack, I'm glad you only spent six weeks in college. Many fellows have spent six or seven thousand dollars there. Why did you go back to your mound building after only a month and a half of academic life? I trust you did not disagree with your professors so that they restored you to the jungle and the Serpent of your Ohio Eden! The next time you write, Jack, tell us how many mounds should be arranged in an acre of well-hilled potatoes.

Chicken Lice Vanish In Twenty-Four Hours

Amazing New Discovery Banishes Vermin Like Magic—Makes Fowls Grow and Lay More Eggs

Practical Poultryman Offers $1 For Every Louse You Can Find.

Lice, chiggers, fleas, mites, etc., probably steal one-third to one-half of the poultry raiser's profits by sucking the very life blood from the flock. But there is no longer any reason why you should suffer this loss since the perfection of a remarkable new mineral formula by science.

Not only does this wonderful method do away with the bother and trouble of greasing, dusting and spraying, but it practically assures doubling your profits because you get more eggs and fatter broilers.

The Lousy Chicken Loses You Money

With this simple, scientific system you merely drop a few mineral tablets in the fowls' drinking water. The tablets quickly dissolve and within a day or two after the fowls drink the water, the lice, fleas, etc., leave like magic. For instance, J. H. Veach, of Logansport, La., writes "The lice left my flock like a swarm of gnats on a sultry morning," and Fergstrand Bros., the widely known Pennsylvania raisers of pure bred poultry, say they will give a dollar for any louse you can find on their poultry since using Paratabs.

This wonderful mineral compound simply puts elements into the fowls' blood which the lice cannot stand, yet is warranted not to flavor the eggs or meat in any way.

Over 150,000 poultry raisers have used this formula known as Paratabs with great success. Many say they would not think of doing without it.

The Healthy, Lice-Free Hen Doubles Your Profits

Lady Jewel, who laid 305 eggs in one year.

Raising Wild Duck and Pheasants

BREEDING game birds, such as pheasants, quail and wild duck, to sell for stocking gentlemen's large estates, has become such a profitable occupation that it is well worth attention. In the past I have gone into the subject of raising pheasants and quail, and now I am in a position to take up wild ducks, for I have had several years' experience, and know that raising them in captivity is both practicable and profitable.

A friend who stayed with us one summer, whilst wandering about on a marshy strip of land the other side of the woods, returned with a much mutilated duck in one hand, and six eggs in his hat. Of course, it was against the game laws to keep eggs, but as the mother bird was lying dead beside the nest, our friend thought it no crime to bring the eggs home. I set them under a broody hen; then I drove to the game warden's, showed him the dead bird, explained how she had been found, and gained his absolution.

In twenty-three days the eggs hatched, and the ducklings were as strong and contented with the mother hen as a brood of Pekins would have been. At first, they had the same custard and rice feed as the other young game birds, supplemented by water from the marshy land. A pan was sunk in the ground near the brood coop, and filled up at each feeding time. A fresh supply being brought up night and morning, it contained innumerable water creatures and some duckweed, which the little fellows devoured eagerly.

The hen was kept imprisoned in the brood coop for two weeks, after which she was allowed to walk out on the lawn with her charges from 9 A. M. to 4 P. M. Being an old hen with strong maternal instincts, she continued to breed the foster family for eight weeks. After that we made a cage like enclosure of wire netting at the end of the orchard, and extended it into the river, put a rough shelter at one corner, and imprisoned one pair of birds.

In the marshy land much further from the house and buildings, another inclosure was made, six feet high, having no wire over the top, as we wanted to try the experiment of giving the birds their liberty when old enough to safely protect themselves. Before they attempted flight, a natural wild duck was found in the yard one morning. Attracted by the cry of the young ones, it had evidently flown in over the top of the wire netting, which had confused and prevented its escape, for the poor thing was lying, half stunned, in a corner. It was captured, and transferred to the inclosure in the orchard, where it soon became nearly as tame as the others.

Late in the season, the young duck was removed, leaving the farm-raised with the wild duck. They were not allowed their liberty until the next spring, and subsequently they nested in the old winter shelter, rearing their brood without any assistance from us.

The wire was entirely removed from around the shelter in the marshy land early in the fall, but one feed a day was still provided. The birds became friendly with others of their kind, and at one time we thought they had deserted us, but in the early spring they returned to their old feeding ground, accompanied by several wild birds.

Stealthy watching and hunting revealed eight nests that year. Eighteen eggs were stolen in all, and set under two hens, and sixteen young ones raised. Eight were sold for ten dollars a pair, to a gentleman who owned a large estate in Rockland County, and desired to establish a breeding ground on marshy land near a lake.

The demand for live birds has outstripped our capacity each year, so I am sure any one going into the business will find it very profitable.

Pheasants will lay in any sheltered corner on the ground rather than in any made nest, and the male birds are really cannibals. If they catch sight of an egg they devour it immediately, so it is well to sneak round the yards, locate the nests, and steal the eggs as frequently as possible. Pheasants are never very good setters or mothers, especially in captivity, so the best plan is to use a bantam or small Leghorn hen to set the eggs under. When you have stolen nine eggs, get a box a foot square, turn it on one side, and across the bottom of the open front nail a slat, behind which place a nest of soft hay. Stand this nest box inside (at one end) of another box two and one-half feet long, with sides a foot or more deep. Make a cover of one-half inch mesh wire netting, for the large box, to open like a lid. Scatter sand on the floor, nail up a small drinking pan in one corner, and you have a safe, rat-proof coop for Biddy and the eggs. Another motive for the outer box is that baby pheasants are so very little, so wild, and so easily frightened, that they are apt to quit the nest as soon as hatched, get lost, become chilled, and die.

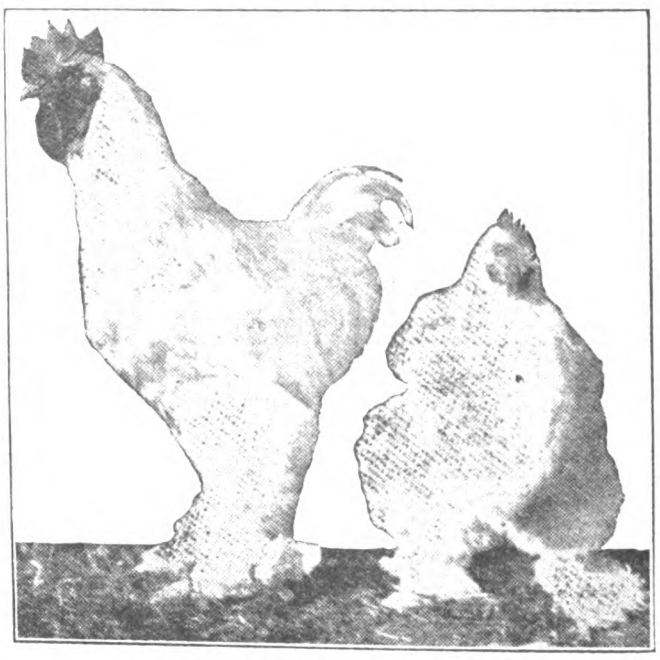
It takes from twenty-five to twenty-six days to incubate eggs. The brood coop to be used the first two weeks should be on the same principle as the nestboxes, and even when they are on the grass run you must exercise the greatest caution to avoid anything like cracks or crevices in or around the sides, for they are such mites, and have such capacity for getting through the eyes of needles, that special care is necessary. If some knothole or depression in the ground has escaped your vigilance, and a baby does stray off, go about two yards away and remain perfectly still. Don't be impatient.

It may be ten minutes before you hear anything. Then, unless all hope is over, you will hear a plaintive little cry. Do not move until it has been repeated three or four times, and you are quite sure where it comes from. Then make a sudden dive and secure the truant, which is usually under a tuft of grass or in some little hole. If you move about while hunting for him, there won't be a sound, and you may hunt all day with little success.

Feed for Young Pheasants

Give the usual nothing for twenty-four hours; then stale cornmeal bread, crumbled (half a cupful), one tablespoonful of silver sand, one tablespoonful of crushed mustard seed, one teaspoonful of maw seed (poppy seed), one-half boiled egg chopped fine. Mix all together and feed every two hours between 6 A. M. and 4 P. M. for three days, after which milk curds, crushed wheat, pinhead oatmeal, chopped lettuce, green onions and boiled liver can be added to the bill of fare.

A change of diet sharpens appetite, so use discretion in alternating the latter dainties. Meat, vegetables or fruit are all necessaries to these birds, and when possible should be supplied in the more natural form of grubs, insects and berries. Ants' eggs are among their favorite foods, and are easily obtained by digging into the middle of an ant hill. Meal grubs can also be created by slightly moistening meal, then keeping it in a moderately warm place.



After the eighth week, cracked corn, wheat, barley, Kafir corn, rape—in fact, all the small grains, are staple food for the rest of their lives, and can always be left before them in self-feeding boxes, for they are not gluttons and never eat too much.

Once a day a crumbly mash containing meat and green stuff of some sort should be fed if the birds are to be kept in good breeding condition.

Bacillary White Diarrhea in Chickens

At least half the letters I receive at this season of the year have to do with the loss among newly hatched chicks, and majority of which have been caused by white diarrhea, so I decided on taking that disease as my text for this month's talk, instead of answering letters individually in a correspondence column, where restricted space prevents me from giving a full description of the disease. For the last few years I have kept in touch with all the research work done in Connecticut, and other experiment stations in regard to the scourge amongst newly hatched chicks, and also have given much time to studying the symptoms and sources of infection on my own farm.

The Storrs College has made a very exhaustive study, and done a great deal of experimental work testing laying hens, fresh and partly incubated eggs: and their work has proved conclusively that the disease is readily transferred from bird to bird and the eggs laid by the infected birds contain the germ of the disease. As in most all other diseases, the symptoms, and appearance of the intestinal organs after death vary considerably, and in very few cases are all the symptoms to be found. But I must of course enumerate all the symptoms, and, as clearly as I can, the conditions, to enable you to recognize those you may meet in different cases. But, remember, you are not likely to find each sufferer carrying all the earmarks of the disease. The earliest deaths may occur within a very short time after hatching, without any prominent symptoms, except-ing, perhaps, weakness and lack of vitality. The characteristic whitish discharge from the vent, makes its appearance in the flock, the time depending without doubt, upon the virulence of the organism and the modeof infection. The discharge may be slight or profuse, in color white or creamy, sometimes mixed with brown. The voided matter has a more or less sticky or glairy character. It may simply streak the down below the vent, or may cling to the down in sufficient quantity to seal up the vent. This is the condition that poultrymen designate as "pasting up behind." This latter condition, however, is not necessarily indicative of white diarrhea.

The chicks soon become listless and sleepy, inclined to huddle together and remain under the hover much of the time. They seem to have no appetite and do not eat much. Frequently when they attempt to take food the action is more or less mechanical. The wings begin to droop or project slightly from the body, with feathers ruffled. In acute cases the eyes are closed, and the chicks become indifferent to everything that goes on about them. Many of the chicks peep or chirp constantly, the sound being shrill or weak according to the strength of the individual. Frequently when endeavoring to void the excreta the chick utters a shrill twitter, apparently a cry of pain. The breathing may be labored, the abdomen heaving with each breath. Occasionally one may note a certain amount of gasping or gaping.

During the progress of the disease the chick may die suddenly, while still fairly strong. When the disease is prolonged the chicken gradually waste away, becoming more and weaker until scarcely able to support their own weight. In this stage they will often be seen to rest against foreign objects for support, standing with legs braced apart, squatting or lying, utterly helpless.

Frequently the chicks take on the appearance which poultrymen call "short backed." The back seems to shorten and the abdomen to protrude out of proportion, causing the chick to look "stilty" as compared with one of normal development. This condition Woods accurately describes as follows:

"The weakling is almost big bellied, the abdomen protruding to the rear so that it bunches out behind, well out of line with the vent, with the result that the chick looks as if the tailpiece and backbone had been pushed forward and in just above the vent."

With few exceptions, the deaths from typical bacillary white diarrhea occur while the chicks are under one month of age. After this a few straggling deaths may be expected, and if complications set in, a high mortality may be observed. The chicks which have had the bacillary white diarrhea seem to be greatly weakened in constitution, and fall an easy prey to disorders which would be resisted easily by normal chicks.

Those which survive remain more or less stunted in their development. Frequently they are misshapen, with long beaks and "crow heads," and with imperfect feathering. In every way they impress one as being weak and lacking in vitality. This condition may persist indefinitely, or the bird may slowly regain vigor and vitality, and finally make satisfactory development.

The usual method of autopsy has been followed, the bird being placed on its back on a board, the outstretched wings and legs tacked in position, the skin covering the breast and abdomen removed, and the internal organs exposed to view by the removal of the entire breastbone. In typical cases the following conditions are found:

Crop—Empty, or partially filled with slimy fluid or with food.

Lungs—Apparently normal.

Liver—Pale, with streaks and patches of red. The congested areas are usually large in size. Occasionally epidemics will be met with in which the liver is more or less congested throughout. In such cases, the portion of the stomach lying in contact with the liver is inflamed.

Kidney and Spleen—Apparently normal.

Intestines—Pale, and for the greater part empty. A small amount of dark grayish or brownish matter frequently present.

Ceca—With but few exceptions but partly filled with a grayish soft material. Only occasional cheesy or firm contents.

Unabsorbed Yolk—Usually present, varying in size from a pea to a full-sized yolk. The color may vary from a yellow to brownish green or nearly black. In consistency there is also much variation. It may appear perfectly normal, distinctly gelatinous, or watery. Frequently it looks like custard, and again it is more or less dry and firm. Unless the chick has been dead some time the yolk is not putrid, but merely stale.

EASY NOW TO RID YOUR PLACE OF FLIES

Widely Known Scientist Discovers Wonderful Chemical that is Fatal to Flies. Not a Poison—Harmless to Stock.

Flies are one of the most dangerous and annoying things with which the farmer has to contend. Now, through the discovery of E. R. Alexander, widely known scientist, you can rid your house and barns and livestock of these pests almost instantly, and with no trouble at all. This discovery is in the form of an organic chemical that is fatal to flies, and similar pests, such as chiggers, mosquitoes and fleas.

This new discovery, which is called Alexander's Rid-O-Fly, is not a poison. Though it kills flies like magic, farm animals and human beings are not affected by it at all. In addition to killing these insects, Rid-O-Fly is a strong repellent. Flies will not come near stock or buildings where Rid-O-Fly has been used. Rid-o-Fly is particularly valuable for cows and horses, as it is a known fact that flies do untold harm to these animals.

So confident is Dr. Alexander that his discovery will rid your house, barns and live stock of these pests that he offers to send a $3.00 supply for only $1.25 on the guarantee that if Rid-O-Fly does not solve your fly problems it will cost you nothing. Two big Kansas City Banks guarantee the reliability of this offer.

SEND NO MONEY—just your name and address to the Alexander Laboratories, 1305 Gateway Station, Kansas City, Mo., and this introductory offer will be mailed at once.

June—Month of Perfection

The Gardener's Busiest Season

UNE is the serene month of all the year; the month of birds and flowers and verdant foliage; the month of smiling skies and smiling brides. Truly "God's in his Heaven; all's right with the world" June, but she lavishes the bounties of Na-e for only a short time, then becomes only ond memory. The gardener must follow advice of Robert Herrick, if he is to enjoy e to the fullest extent, given in the lines:

"Gather ye rose buds while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying,
And the same flower that smiles today
Tomorrow will be dying."

Good advice, that, whether it be applied the time spent in the flower garden or with or sprinkling can or trowel among the etables. Early and late in the garden is rule in June, but we will not call the long irs work; after the long winter that is past, before the arrival of the hot days of toil come, garden work now is play, a pleasure be enjoyed to the fullest.

Keep the garden working by planting a cession of the vegetables you like best. is is the very best way to lengthen the sea- of productiveness. Plant spinach, beans, rots, peas, corn, radishes, beets, lettuce kohlrabi at intervals of two to three weeks. dry regions radishes and late peas may not vive summer drought, so others must be sen. The main thing is to see that no und is allowed to remain idle. Beans may alternated with cucumbers in the row, then bean plants pulled up after they have shed bearing, making ample room for the umbers to spread.

Do not forget squash and pumpkins. They ive best if planted when the ground is warm, they must be given room to spread. In shade of the sweet corn rows is a fine place both, if the corn is cut and removed after as produced. Two new varieties of dwarf ash are worthy of the attention of garden-

These are suited to any location where larger squashes will thrive, but are more irable because of their smaller size and re- tion of waste when prepared for the table. is a small edition of the well-known Hub- d, developed by inbreeding by the Minne- a Experiment Station. On the market it best known as "Kitchenette", is dark green olor and fully equal to the larger Hubbards lavor. Average size is less than 5 pounds. s uniform in size, attractive in appearance, keeps perfectly in storage. The fact that natures one to two weeks earlier than the er kinds is an added inducement. The er new dwarf squash is especially adapted Minnesota and Iowa, where it originated, should do well in other regions when it ives a trial. It is even earlier than the rf Hubbard, and averages even smaller ize. It is dark green and smooth, or free n the "warts" common to Hubbards, but en stored it ripens to a bright golden color. Pumpkins need little or no care after plant- and are doubly deserving of garden space, we have yet to find anyone who does not pumpkin pie—and the children just can't ebrate Hallowe'en without Jack o' lanterns. e small pie pumpkins have the call over big, coarse varieties, as any housewife ows. They store better, have thinner skins, cker and better flavored flesh. Plant a hills of pumpkins, then leave their care Nature.

Dust Mulch Is Valuable

Good advice for the gardener is contained the lines "Who would have a fine garden ist look well to the soil thereof, that it be t cumbered with tares and other greedy eds that do rob the worthy flowers or fruit." e of the most important factors in the suc- s of a vegetable garden is the maintenance what experienced gardeners know as the ust mulch." This is nothing more nor less an a coating of dry, very fine earth covering e soil of the planted area to a depth of one wo inches. It is created and maintained frequent cultivation with a common hoe, uffle-hoe, wheel hoe or rake, the work being ne as soon as the water has soaked into the ound after a shower or the use of hose or rinkling can.

The principles of the dust mulch are sim- city itself. Normally there is constant aporation of soil moisture during dry weath- the moisture working up through to the face. This is brought about by what is led "capillary attraction"; each grain of htly packed soil is surrounded by a very in film of moisture, and the soil particles ing in close contact enables the water film move upwards as if "drawn by the sun". is constant evaporation from the soil, of urse, exhausts the moisture supply around e roots of plants. When it is remembered at the feeding roots of plants can take food ly in liquid form, it is easily seen that unless e moisture content of the soil is maintained e food elements contained in the soil cannot utilized and the plants cannot thrive.

Now, the dust mulch checks evaporation breaking up the innumerable little columns water before they reach the surface and ake their escape into the air. Hence it acts a most effective conserver of soil moisture—sort of "insulater" that prevents evaporation. garden that is carefully dust mulched will ok quite dry on the surface, but by digging wn a couple of inches it will be found to be mp and cool, even on the hottest day. Here- lies full proof that the roots are well nourish-

Another advantage of the dust mulch is at the cultivation necessary to maintain it bound to hold the weeds in check—and we ve yet to find a garden that hasn't some eds that need checking. The recipe for e truly weedless garden has not yet been discovered, we must sadly admit, but constant care will go far in the right direction.

Nicotine Dust for Insect Control

A comparatively new method of insect control has recently been announced by the Bureau of Entomology, following extended tests in which this method has surpassed any other known method of controlling such important truck-crop pests as onion thrips, cucumber beetles, melon aphis and pea aphis. Nicotine dust has several advantages over a liquid spray of nicotine sulphate. Dusting requires much less weight of material per acre than spraying, and may be done in a much shorter time with a lighter and less expensive machine. The tiny particles of dust reach many insects that would escape the most carefully applied sprays. Dust may be applied with hand dusters, horse-drawn machines or power-operated outfits, according to the size of the farm or garden.

Nicotine dust is a nicotine sulphate solution mixed in correct proportions with a dust carrier. Lime alone is usually used for the carrier, but the addition of sulphur to the lime makes the material more effective against most insects. Several thorough applications are necessary; these should be made when the insect pests first appear, but before they have done serious damage. The dust is most effective at temperatures above 65 degrees Far., and when the air is still. It loses strength if held for any great length of time or if not put up in airtight containers. Several forms of chewing insects attacking vegetable crops can be controlled by adding 10 per cent. of powdered lead arsenate to the nicotine dust used against aphis or thrips, and it should also be used in this combination when dusting small plants for cucumber beetles.

Be Ready for Rose Chafers

About this time of the year when grapes, roses and many garden flowers and vines are in blossom, long-legged beetles about one-third of an inch in length appear suddenly in great swarms in some parts of the country. These beetles are usually a light ocher or yellowish brown in color, and are variously known as rose chafers or "rose bugs". In northern states they make their appearance after the middle of June; in the South they come two or three weeks earlier. For some three to six weeks they remain to strip bushes and vines of blossoms and foliage, overrun the garden, vineyard, orchard and nursery, overlooking little that is green, then disappearing almost as suddenly as they came. As the pests do not confine their ravages to any one particular part of a plant, but consume blossoms, leaves, fruit and green stems with equal relish, they leave desolation behind them in regions and years of worst infestation.

The rose chafer is not only a serious pest; it is one of the most difficult of all our insects to combat successfully. If the insects are present in great numbers no effective remedy is known.

Every insect in the garden or on the rose bushes may be killed one day; the next day the plants will again be completely covered with a new horde of hungry eaters, perhaps a new brood or perhaps insects that have migrated from elsewhere. Therefore, to be of any value whatever, spraying must be almost continuous, and this is impossible in large areas. None of the common sprays are of any value; compounds of copper, lime, kerosene, pyrethrum, hot water, tobacco, quassia, as well as solutions of alum, hellebore and the proprietary remedies prove absolutely useless. Paris green damages the flowers but unless frequently applied does little good. Arsenate of lead comes closest to being effective, both as a repellent and a poison, but it works slowly and leaves a whitish deposit on leaves and stems of plants. However, if applied when the pests first make their appearance, it does help to some extent, and is here advised for the want of anything better. Hand picking, the good old-fashioned remedy, is of service when the pests infest rose bushes, grapes and other low growing plants, but in years of heavy infestation this method does little good. The best time to hand pick is in the early morning or the evening every day. Occasional picking is useless.

Transplanting Suggestions

Hot weather often arrives before transplanting is completed, and when this is the case results are likely to be unsatisfactory unless the work is carefully done. Earlier in the season wilting seldom causes damage; in the hot days of June it often proves fatal. Therefore, to assure satisfactory results, wilting should be reduced to a minimum in both extent and duration. To prevent it entirely is out of the question. Plants will wilt despite all that can be done; but if wilting is slight, and is not allowed to last so long that drying and shriveling results, the chances of recovery are good.

When young plants are dug from starting beds preparatory to transplanting, have handy sized boxes or trays ready to receive them. These trays should be partly filled with loose earth, not clay but loam, for clay will pack and "puddle" when soaked with water. As the plants are dug and placed in the tray, soak the soil with water and press it down around the roots. Do not dig plants, place them in a basket without earth, then take them to the garden and expect them to thrive. This probably may work in earlier and cooler times, but not when the sun is hot and the soil dry.

Many market gardeners do this: They use a large umbrella with a sharpened handle. This is kept over the trays as they are carried or hauled to the garden. It is then stuck into the ground and moved along the row as transplanting progresses. This plan is particularly useful when sunshades or screens are to be left to protect each plant.

Young plants wilt mainly because they need water—and do not get it. If it is supplied liberally the death rate is greatly reduced. Keep a sprinkling can (from which the perforated nozzle has been removed) handy throughout the transplanting operation. As the hole for each plant is made with a dibble, pour it full of water. This will quickly be absorbed, if the soil is dry; repeat the filling until the soil for three inches on all sides is thoroughly saturated. This may sound like a rather slow and tedious operation, and one that will require a deal of water carrying, but it will guarantee better results—and that makes it well worth while. After the soil has been saturated in three or four holes, quickly set the plants with the root well covered. Shallow planting is unsatisfactory. Press the earth firmly down all around, using a small handful of dry soil to finish with. This helps to reduce evaporation by preserving a dust mulch.

If sunshades are to be used, they should be set out now; to delay the placing of shades, where they are needed, is little better than to go without them. For handiness and cheapness, old shingles serve nicely. Stick them into the ground on the south side of each plant, letting each shingle slant so that the top comes directly above the plant. This will give good shade during the hottest and brightest time of the day.

Making Alfalfa Hay

June usually finds hay-making well under way in every region where alfalfa is grown. Though the number of cuttings may vary from one or two in the north, or in semi-arid districts, to six or even eight in irrigated sections of the southwest, and though soil, climate and variety of other conditions have a direct bearing on the crop wherever grown. June everywhere is "alfalfa month". It is then that most of the hay is made; it is then, too, that mistakes in hay-making occur, and they are by no means uncommon.

Alfalfa should be cut when the plants are well in bloom. Cutting at an earlier state of growth gives hay of a higher protein content, but the strands are maintained in better condition if cut when nearer full bloom. In the east, alfalfa sometimes blooms very sparingly when the season is too wet or too dry, so it is very difficult to determine the stage of maturity by the number of blossoms. When this is the case it becomes necessary to watch the basal shoots and cut when they are well started. As the leaves contain about two-thirds of the feeding value of the plant, an effort should be made to get the hay into the stack or mow with as little loss of leaves as possible. This can be accomplished only by handling as little and as carefully as possible after the hay begins to dry. The hay should be raked before it becomes brittle, and most of the curing should be done in the cock; in this respect the process differs from that employed for timothy hay. In humid sections hay caps, each consisting of a piece of canvas about a yard square, help greatly in making hay of good quality but they increase the cost and labor. Where the weather is uncertain the farmer may be justified in hastening the process by doing more curing in the swath and finishing in the windrow. By this method the hay is exposed for a shorter time between cutting and storing, and while some leaves are lost the actual loss in feeding value may be less than would result from unfavorable weather even if the hay were put up in cocks.

Sudan Grass and Soy Beans for Hay

Sudan grass grown alone, or in combination with soy beans, has been discussed briefly in these columns in the past, but we take the chance of repeating here because of the importance of the subject. Experimental work and farm reports both bear out the fact that broadcasting or drilling sudan grass, when alone, at the rate of 20 to 25 pounds to the acre gives best results. This rate of seeding seems to be best for hay production, giving a close stand of finer stemmed grass. Sudan grass has the special advantage of making a fine stand of hay when seeded as late as the first of July, and as a "smother crop" it has never been excelled when employed to choke out quack grass or other noxious weeds.

Sudan grass grown in combination with soy beans has plainly demonstrated in many trials its fitness as an emergency hay crop, slightly outyielding any other plant in hay crop, such as peas and oats, or soy beans alone, when grown under favorable conditions. Seeding at a rate of 10 pounds of sudan grass and 1½ to 2 bushels of soy beans per acre gives most satisfactory results.

Tests made by the Wisconsin Experiment Station in various parts of the state under widely different conditions of soil, climate and rainfall gave the following yields of peas and oats, soy beans alone, and sudan grass sown with soy beans. Under all conditions, as the records show, the sudan grass soy bean combination proved the heaviest yielding emergency hay crop.

1½ bu. Canada peas with 1½ bu. oats	3.69 tons
2 bu. Canada peas with 1½ bu. oats	3.34 "
2 bu. Marrowfat peas with 1½ bu. oats	3.11 "
1½ bu. Scotch peas with 1½ bu. oats	3.10 "
1½ bu. Wis. peas with 1½ bu. oats	3.32 "
1½ bu. Black Eyebrow soy beans seeded alone	4.00 tons
2 bu. Black Eyebrow soy beans seeded alone	3.91 tons
2½ bu. Black Eyebrow soy beans seeded alone	3.85 tons
10 lbs. Sudan grass with 1½ bu. Black Eyebrows	3.46 tons
10 lbs. Sudan grass with 2 bu. Black Eyebrows	4.04 tons
10 lbs. Sudan grass with 2½ bu. Black Eyebrows	4.00 tons

A Simply Constructed "Flivver" Set

THE following is a description of a set of the "flivver" variety which the author recently constructed with very gratifying results. The feedback effect is obtained in the same way as the familiar DeForest Ultra-audion circuit and does not require a separate tickler coil as in all the other sets previously described in this column. It will be found that the set regenerates very well on practically any wavelength adjustment and, as there is but one control, after the filament and switch are set the outfit will be very easy to tune. The list of parts necessary in constructing set are listed below:

1 Panel of wood, Bakelite, hard rubber, asbestos board etc., 7½ inches by 7½, by three sixteenth of an inch.

1 .0005 M. F. variable condenser must be small size. Vernier attachment preferred.

1 Switcharm 1 inch radius.

4 Switch Points.

2 Switch stops.

1 dial 3 inches diameter.

1 Rheostat with vernier attachment.

1 cardboard tube 3½ inches diameter 4 inches long, one-eighth of an inch thick.

1 V. T. socket for UV200 bulb or WD11 as desired.

½ lb spool No. 22 wire.

8 binding posts.

1 Baseboard, 7½ inches by 6, by five-eighths inch.

The layout of the panel is shown in Fig. 1 which also shows the various controls in their proper places. The set consists of but one variable condenser, a tapped inductance with the necessary switch, and the audion controlling unit.

The centers for the switch, variable condenser, audion sight holes and rheostat are each located at a distance of 2 inches from all edges and are to be prickpunched first. The holes for mounting screws for the condenser and rheostat can not be shown as these instruments will vary in make according to the discretion of the builder; therefore centers only can be given. This will be found to be a very simple matter and need not be gone into at length. The switch arm may be conveniently of 1 inch radius and the four points are spaced off on the large circle about five sixteenths of an inch apart and opposite each end point a one-eighth inch hole is drilled to accommodate a stop pin. This prevents the switcharm from sliding off the points. The audion sight holes are laid out by first striking a circle from the prickpunched center with a five-eighth inch radius, and, using the same setting of the compass, divide the circle into 6 equal parts. The intersections of the circle are now carefully spotted with the prickpunch and they are ready to drill.

The Antenna and Ground binding posts are located on a line five-eighths of an inch from the left-hand edge of panel and five-eighths of an inch from the lower and upper edges respectively. The extreme outer binding posts on the opposite side of panel are located in an exactly similar manner and the balance are measured from them. The two top posts are for the phones and are one inch between centers. The same is true of the two lower posts which are for the A Battery connections, while the middle pair are located from the center line of panel and are also one inch apart. These are for the B Battery.

The panel is now ready for drilling and we start with the smallest sizes first which will be the holes for the switch points. These should be made with a one-eighth inch drill and care should be taken that they exactly split the line or the switch will present a very poor appearance. It would be well to use this same drill to start all the other holes on the panel and "chase" it with larger sizes as a more accurate job will result. Bakelite, particularly, is peculiar material to drill and the drill is all too liable to "creep".

All shaft holes should be made ¼ inch, also the audion sight holes. The latter will also look more businesslike if they are deeply countersunk and possibly a further improvement may be made by making the center hole a little larger than the others. This is largely a matter of taste and may be safely left to the builder.

When all holes are drilled the next procedure is to lightly touch the edges of all the holes with a countersink or drill of large diameter in order to remove all burrs.

If desired the panel may then be rubbed down with a piece of medium sandpaper and given a satin finish which is preferred by many experimenters. The panel is then laid, face down, on a table and the capacity screen is applied before any of the various instruments are mounted. This consists of a large piece of tin or copper foil which has previously been rolled out perfectly flat and free from wrinkles. The panel is given a good coat of shellac and a match is immediately touched to it in order to burn off all the excess alcohol and water. This leaves the remaining shellac in a very sticky state and before it has a chance to dry further the foil is applied and rolled down hard and even with a smooth roller. The foil is then rubbed hard with the fingers until all the holes which have been drilled show up in sharp relief through the foil which is then cut away neatly in such a way that no metallic contact may be made with any of the instruments or wires. The foil immediately surrounding the ground binding post, however, is left untouched and serves to ground the screen effectively.

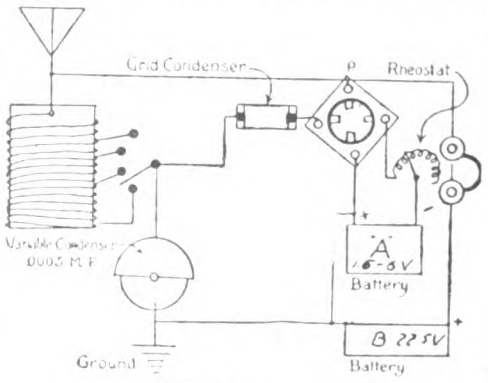

Figure 3.

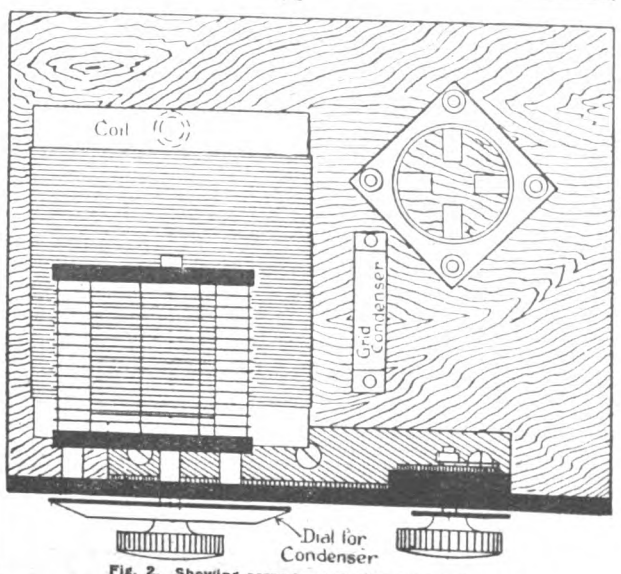

Fig. 2. Showing arrangement of various instruments.

Winding the Inductance

The inductance is wound on a cardboard tube 3½ inches in diameter and about 4 inches long. The winding should be of No. 22 single covered copper wire and, if made exactly as described, should tune to the following wave-lengths.

Point 1. Tapped at 22nd turn, Waverange 150 to 240 meters.

Point 2. Tapped at 35th turn, Waverange 212 to 339 meters.

Point 3. Tapped at 61st turn, Waverange 315 to 506 meters.

Point 4. Tapped at 99th turn, Waverange 446 to 715 meters.

The method of winding is as follows:

Starting ½ inch from one end of tube, 22 turns are wound tightly and evenly together and in order to give the correct wavelength range as shown above the actual length of coil thus far wound should be exactly 7 inches. If wire used is double covered probably it will be necessary to use about one turn less. The wire is now given a single loose turn back over the coil thus far wound and the end of the turn brought back to the point where it left the coil. Winding is then continued until the coil is exactly 1.1 inch long. This should be taken exactly at the 35th turn. A tap is taken at this point by again making one loose turn back over the already wound section of the coil. The remaining taps are taken off at 1.9 inches and 3.1 inches as shown above and the winding is finished. It should be noted here that there are many sets being advertised on the market which seem to have been "designed" as a vehicle for advertising switch points. Most of these sets have been built with little regard to efficient tuning and can hardly be expected to deliver the same results as can a set which has been really designed. The above described coil shows that a very few points on a series antenna condenser will give tuning over a considerable range.

The baseboard is next in line to receive attention and may be a piece of birch, quarter oak or other wood which will take a good finish. Soft wood such as pine or boxwood should not be used. The coil is mounted on the baseboard in such a position as to be close to the rear of the switch and directly under the variable condenser. The leads from the coil which were left as loops around it, are now cut and the two ends twisted and soldered together in each case leaving four long connections which are later soldered to the proper points. The panel is fastened to the baseboard by means of a 5 inch length of ½ inch angle brass and six screws. Three of these are flat head eight-thirtysecond machine screws and the others small wood screws. The audion socket is next mounted in place on the baseboard directly in line with sight holes in panel, and set is ready to wire. The wiring diagram, Fig. 3, will doubtless be self explanatory and we believe that no one should have the smallest difficulty in making the various connections. The grid condenser may be of .00025 M. F. 0005 M. F. according to taste used. If WD11 tube is used the only difference in connecting up set will be the A Battery which should be 1.5 Volts instead of 6 Volts as for UV200 tubes. We shall be very glad to hear from any of our readers who make up this set and to learn what results they get with it. A later article will describe a two stage amplifier to be used in connection with this set.

Questions and Answers

Q.—What wave length does N A A send on? A. J. L., Paris, Ill.

A.—N. A. A. sends on a wave length of 710 meters.

Q.—Can I use a dry cell instead of a storage battery for my crystal set? O. H. R., Ironia, Wis.

A.—It is not necessary to use any battery at all on a crystal set if Galena crystal is used, and as this is the best type of crystal for music reception you need not worry over a battery.

Q.—Could I use a vacuum tube or a three cir mounting to improve my set? If used separately which would give the best results?

A. G., Denver, Colo.

A.—A vacuum tube would certainly improve your set but it is hard to tell whether a three cir mounting would benefit you or not as we do not know what you are using now.

Q.—Which gives the best service, insulated or bare wire for an aerial? How much does a vacuum tube cost? B. B., Revil, Ky.

A.—It makes no difference whether the aerial wire is bare or covered. A vacuum tube for detector costs $5.00 and for an amplifier costs $6.50.

Q.—Can a WD-11 tube be used on the set described in the COMFORT?

A.—Yes. In case this type of tube is used it is best to use the WD-11 tube socket.

Q.—Is it possible to use a loud speaker on a crystal set if the sending station is located close by?

A.—No. It requires a Vacuum tube to work a loud speaker and there should be at least one step of amplification.

NOTE.—We are informed by the publisher of Q S T magazine that the March, 1922 issue of QST, which contained the improved Reinartz tuner article, is completely sold out. The March QST Reinartz article was reproduced exactly in the October, 1922 issue of the Modulator, Room 205, 120 Liberty St., New York City, where copy can be obtained for 10 cents.—EDITOR.

Brownie's Triumph

"You have not yet told me, nor will I ask you tonight, how you happened to leave London so suddenly. Wilbur Coolidge told me that I should find you at the Washington," he said, as he drew near the door.

"Yes, I did tell him that I should be there for a few days, but an accident prevented my ever going to the hotel at all. I am now with Lady Ruxley, at her cottage near Willingham Hall."

"Zounds! She has got right back into that Coolidge nest again, poor thing! I wonder if she knows it, or has seen them yet?" was Adrian's inward comment; then he said aloud: "If you remain her a few days I shall probably see you again."

Then, as he clasped her hand, he continued, with a smile:

"Now, good-night; and, Miss Douglas, do not go wandering off by yourself again in the night to places you know nothing of."

Again she thrilled at his touch, and the fire leaped into her cheeks at his words.

"I will not," she promised, with a little answering smile, though he saw the tears were dropping from her eyes, as she added: "But Mr. Dredmond, I have not been able to find words adequate to express my feelings for what you have done for me tonight; but surely you will not deem me ungrateful."

"No, no, dar—" He nearly said it in spite of himself, but quickly checking the word, he exclaimed: "Great Heaven! how it unmans me even now to think of it; but I pray you go to rest, and try to forget it if you can."

He led her up the steps to a side door, where she could enter unseen, let her in, then wandered away by himself again into the park, his soul stirred to its very depths by the events of the last half hour.

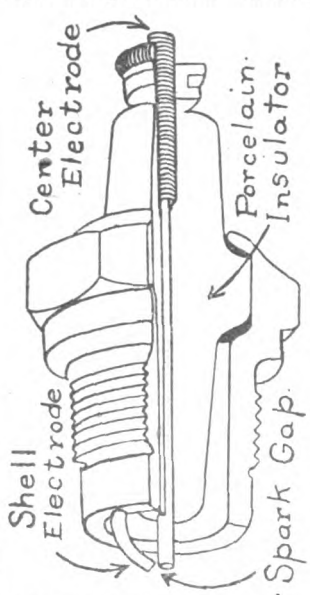
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps



Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Spark Plug

THE spark plug is placed in the cylinder to ignite the charge of gasolene and air. The plug consists of two electrodes. One of these electrodes is a part of the metal shell which screws into the cylinder. The other, or center electrode, is insulated, usually in porcelain, and connects to the high tension cable through which the current for ignition purposes is furnished. The electrical current travels down the insulated center electrode and in order to obtain a ground or return is compelled to jump the gap which exists between the center and shell electrode. As above stated, the latter electrode is a part of the shell which screws into the cylinder and after jumping the gap the current finds a return through the engine and frame to the coil.

To obtain the best results from a spark plug, the proper space must exist between the two electrodes. If the spark is too great, the engine will have a tendency to miss on heavy pulls and if the setting is too close the engine will miss under light loads. In the absence of the manufacturer's gauge for setting the gap, adjust for a space of about the thickness of a smooth dime. When setting the gap, never bend the center electrode as it is insulated and a strain may cause the porcelain to crack. Always make the adjustment by bending the electrode attached to the shell, which screws into the cylinder.

When a cylinder is not firing, first determine the cylinder by short circuiting the spark plug. Use a screw-driver so that the hand comes in contact with the wooden handle only. Place the screw-driver so that the end contacts with the cylinder or some other metal part which fastens to the cylinder. With the metal shank of the screw-driver touch the top of the center electrode of the plug. If, when testing the plug action in this manner, the operation of the engine changes, it indicates that this plug is in proper firing condition. Should, however, you short a plug and not change the engine operation, it indicates that you have found the cylinder that has not been firing.

Spark Plug Cut Open to Show Interior Parts.

First make certain that current is being delivered to the plug. Instead of touching the center electrode with the shank of the screw-driver, move the shank away from the electrode about a one-thirty-second of an inch. If current is being delivered, it will jump the gap between the electrode and the screw-driver shank. Do not move the point of the screw-driver away from contact with the cylinder or other metal part.

Remove the plug that is not firing and note if there is an accumulation of oil or soot on the electrodes. Wipe off the soot or soil and clean the electrodes with fine emery cloth or sandpaper.

Some plugs are so constructed that the center electrode can be removed. When the plug is of this construction, it should be taken apart and cleaned thoroughly. If the examination discloses that the porcelain insulator is cracked, the plug should be discarded and a new one installed.

However, when it cannot be determined if the insulator is cracked or otherwise defective, the plug should be shorted on the outside of the cylinder. After being cleaned as thoroughly as possible, it should be connected to the high tension cable and the engine started. If the current jumps the gap between the two electrodes, one can be reasonably sure that the plug will fire when installed. A good way to clean a dirty plug is to wash it in alcohol.

Healthful Pointers

Adjusting Brakes

It is the usual practice for the manufacturer to provide means for adjusting the car brakes. The owner should read the instruction book provided so as to gain an understanding of the working principle of the brake and the manner in which they are adjusted. Too often the owner will shorten the pull rods or cables to obtain better brake action. This is sometimes necessary for internal expanding brakes but for the external contracting type, in the majority of cases, the adjustment should not be made by shortening the cables. Usually the proper procedure is to adjust the band so that it has the proper clearance from the brake drum. One or more adjustments are usually provided for this purpose. Shortening the pull cables changes the position of the lever which operates the brakes and limits the brake action. The proper method is to compensate for the brake lining wear and not to shorten the brake action.

Straightening Parts

The highest grades of alloy steels are used in the construction of the modern automobile. These steels, after being shaped into useful parts, are oftentimes scientifically heat treated to give the greatest amount of strength and durability. By careful tests, the manufacturer has determined the kind of treatment to give the different parts to insure the maximum service. Should an accident cause a treated part to become bent, the safe plan is to replace it with a new one obtained from the manufacturer. Should an attempt be made to straighten the part by heating and bending it is almost impossible to heat treat the part so that it will have its original strength. There is a chance of the part being under treated and soft or treated too hard so that it becomes brittle. Likewise, it is not safe to purchase parts from firms which manufacture parts for certain makes of cars. The manufacturer makes and treats the parts, using formulæ which were made after exhaustive experimental work. As a rule, the outside parts manufacturer does not know the manufacturer's formulæ and usually an inferior product is purchased, the inducement being a few cents saved on the purchase price. The one safe way is to purchase parts direct from the car manufacturer or from an authorized service station.

Adjusting Bearings

Taper roller bearings such as used for front wheels, rear axles, etc., should not be adjusted too tightly. These bearings will run even when adjusted in that manner but with an injurious result. If after making an adjustment it is found that the locking device cannot be set in place without tightening on the adjustment a trifle more, slack off on the adjustment rather than tighten it. These bearings should have running clearance and a slight amount of play is more desirable than a tight fit.

Springs

The car springs are so located that they receive water, dirt, mud, etc., depending on the condition of the road. These foreign matters gradually work in between the spring leaves forming rust and resistance to the spring action. About every 500 miles it is a good plan to scrub the dirt and other foreign matter from the sides of the spring and with a brush coat the edges of the leaves with a light cylinder oil. Lubricant that has been drained from the motor crankcase is excellent for this purpose. The natural action of the spring, when the car is in motion, will allow a certain portion of the oil to work in between the leaves and provide the needed lubrication for the leaves to slide.

Headlight Reflectors

A great many headlight reflectors are silvered and much care must be exercised not to scratch them when cleaning. Frequent cleaning is not recommended. However, when it becomes necessary to do so it is well to use powdered dry rouge and a clean soft chamois skin. Polish lightly and avoid hard rubbing.

Carbon Monoxide

At this season of the year, the owner is apt to spend considerable time tuning the engine. At least once a year, these columns contain the warning against the running of the engine in a garage or room that is not amply ventilated. The exhaust of a gasolene engine contains a deadly poisonous gas known as carbon monoxide. It has been claimed by some that the presence of the gas to an injurious extent is manifested by the workman experiencing a nauseous sensation. However, there are cases where it would appear that the workman experienced no personal discomfiture until it was too late for him to help himself or summon aid. Unless the garage doors and windows are thrown wide open so as to completely ventilate the room, the one safe plan, if the engine is to run for a length of time, is to first run the car outside and make the adjustments in the open.

Starter Trouble

Many cars are equipped with a starting arrangement which includes a pinion which slides along a spiral into engagement with teeth on the flywheel. Should the pinion become stuck on the spiral and refuse to mesh with the teeth on the flywheel, it should be cleaned thoroughly with kerosene and then lubricated well.

Vacuum Tank Care

Should you be tinkering around the car and in the course of events your attention become focused on the vacuum tank, pass on. Do not allow your imagination to lead you to believe that some adjustment or cleaning will give better operation. Unless gasolene is not being delivered to the carburetor leave the tank absolutely alone. The tank is of durable construction and ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, when gasolene does not flow to the carburetor, the trouble is due to a loose connection, clogged or broken pipe, rather than in the tank.

Easing a Jolt

When driving across a raised track or cross walk, the jolt can be reduced to the minimum if the car is driven diagonally across rather than to allow both wheels to strike the track or walk at the same time.

Cleaning Upholstery

The upholstery of the car can be brightened by wiping with a chamois wrung out of clear water. Do not use gasolene for this purpose.

Cleaning Commutator

When necessary to clean the commutator of a generator or starting motor use a very fine sand paper. Never use emery cloth.

Washing Car

When washing the car, use an abundance of water. Remove the nozzle from the hose and use a gently flowing stream. Direct the water on the body until it softens the dust and dirt. With the water constantly directed in front of a clean sponge, proceed to gently wash the car. Do not rub with the sponge as there is danger of scratching the finish. After the body has been cleaned in this manner, again shower the car with water after which polish with a clean chamois wrung out of clear water. Do not use the same sponge on the chassis as used on the body. Usually the chassis is spotted at points with oil and grease and for this reason it is well to keep a separate sponge for chassis cleaning.

Answers to Questions

VACUUM TANK BALKS.—My Elgin six, 1919 model, touring car, which is equipped with a Stromberg carbureter and Steward vacuum tank, is in fine condition otherwise than that the vacuum tank will not pump any gas. Yet there seems to be nothing wrong with the vacuum tank or carbureter. Where should I look for the trouble?

Can a 12-volt switch from a Dodge car be used successfully on a light Overland four which is equipped with a 6-volt system?

Mrs. R. K. B., Flasher, N. Dak.

A.—If the vacuum tank has been allowed to stand without gasolene in it for a long time, the tank should be primed by removing the plug in top of the tank and pouring in a supply of gasolene. If, however, you have been driving the car and the trouble but recently appeared, you should look for loose or broken connections. Make certain that the suction pipe connection is tight at the intake manifold. Examine the connection where the pipe line enters the gasolene tank. The connection may be loose or the pipe line broken. Cases have been known where the short pipe in the gasolene tank has been broken off. A careful check of the pipe lines and connections should readily disclose your trouble. Voltage does not enter into the selection of a switch. If the switch you have in mind can be installed and connected, it should operate satisfactorily.

SLIPPING CLUTCH.—The engine of my 1922 Ford roadster runs fine, but when I shift from low into high the engine will run a long time before it takes hold. What is the trouble?—A. L. J., Decatur, Ind.

A.—The trouble is undoubtedly due to a slipping clutch. Remove the plate on the transmission cover under the floor boards at the driver's feet. Remove the cotter key on the first clutch finger and move the set screw from one-half to a complete turn to the right. Adjust the remaining clutch fingers in like manner, being certain to turn each set screw the same distance. Do not fail to replace the cotters. Be careful you do not drop small tools or other articles into the transmission case as it is almost impossible to recover them without taking off the transmission cover.

Ford Runs 57 Miles on Gallon of Gasoline

A new automatic Vaporizer and Decarbonizer, which in actual test has increased the power and mileage of Fords from 25 to 50 per cent and at the same time removed every particle of carbon from the cylinders is the proud achievement of John A. Stransky, 3831 South Main Street, Pukwana, South Dakota. A remarkable feature of this simple and inexpensive device is that its action is governed entirely by the motor. It is slipped between the carburetor and intake manifold and can be installed by anyone in five minutes without drilling or tapping. With it attached, Ford cars have made from 40 to 57 miles on one gallon of gasoline. Mr. Stransky wants to place a few of these devices on cars in this territory and has a very liberal offer to make to anyone who is able to handle the business which is sure to be created wherever this marvelous little device is demonstrated. If you want to try one entirely at his risk send him your name and address today.—Adv.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. E. M. T., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a husband can be compelled to support his wife unless she abandons him without good cause, or unless she has sufficient means to provide for her own support; we think the wife's right of support can be enforced against any property the husband may own in case he leaves the state and a court order cannot be enforced against him personally.

Mrs. A. M., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that no woman while married may by will bequeath more than two-thirds of her property away from her husband, that all except noncupative wills must be subscribed at the end thereof by the testator or testatrix, and must be signed in the presence of the attesting witnesses or acknowledged by the testator to them, and that the testator must at the time acknowledge such instrument to be his last will and testament, and that there must be two attesting witnesses who should sign the will as such witnesses in the presence of the testator and in the presence of each other. We think you should employ a local lawyer to attend to the drawing of the will and to see that the same is properly signed.

Mrs. R. S., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and having no child nor descendant, his surviving widow, in addition to certain allowances, would receive one-half of the estate, the balance going to his parents, brothers and sisters depending upon who is left, if he leaves no kindred within the degrees capable of inheriting the whole estate would go to the surviving widow.

Miss K. A. M., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that detail brought to enforce the payment of a promissory note, not under seal, must be brought within three years after the last payment thereon, or other evidence of indebtedness, except in cases where the holder thereof is under legal disability, or in cases where the debtor absents himself from the state.

E. H. J., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no child nor descendant, and leaving no will, her surviving husband would receive one-half of the real and personal estate belonging to her at her death absolutely, subject to the payment of her debts; if she desires him to receive the whole estate, she should make a will.

Z. P., Idaho.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of either husband or wife, survivor takes one-half of the community property, and that in the absence of a will, in addition thereto one-half of the decedant's separate property if decedent leaves but one child, but if there is more than one child then the children take two-thirds of each separate estate. The children or descendants of a deceased child taking by representation, and step-children having no interest in their step-parent's estate, unless some provision is made for them by will, and except that in turn they may inherit from their own parent such portion as he or she may receive from decendant's estate.

Mrs. I. L., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, his whole estate, subject to the payments of debts and expenses, would go to his surviving widow.

M. T., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, his surviving widow would, in addition to certain small allowances, receive one-third of the real and personal estate, subject to the payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the estate going to his child or children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share; the appointment of an administrator would be necessary for the settlement of the estate, and the widow would be entitled to such appointment.

Mrs. J. W. L., Texas.—Under the laws of Alabama, we do not think you can now recover any portion of your property in that state sold by your father 30 years ago.

Mrs. G. W. D., Texas.—We do not think a child born to a bigamous marriage would have any inheritance rights from the father's estate, unless some provision was made for such child by will. We think the marriage of the man you mention during the lifetime of his wife, from whom he was not divorced, was a bigamous and illegal marriage and that he could be punished for contracting such a marriage.

Miss C. W., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the taxes upon the property left by your father is assessed against the property and in default of payment your local tax authorities have power to sell the property for such non-payment of taxes; we think if you pay your brother and sisters' share of these taxes you will be entitled to recover from them their share of such taxes.

A. S., Wisconsin.—If the stories your husband's relatives tell about you constitute slander you would, of course, have a legal right to proceed against them, but if the matter is just a family quarrel it might be better to pay no attention to their stories, as if your conduct is beyond reproach you may be sure your neighbors will sympathize with you, and their stories will do you no real harm.

Mrs. B. W., Kansas.—If the Company from whom you purchased the chickens you mention refuse to either send you the chickens or return your money, we think it will be necessary for you to bring an action against them to enforce your rights in the matter.

J. F., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children, the widow in addition to certain allowances, would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in the real estate, and one-third of the personal estate, absolutely subject to the payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the estate going in equal shares to the children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share; we think the widow can dispose of her share of the estate in any manner she may see fit, but that as above stated her dower in the real estate is only a life estate.

Miss A. B., Illinois.—If as you state your grandfather has sufficient means to provide for his support we think it proper if you take care of him and support him that you should be paid; we think you should have a definite agreement as to the amount of your pay.

Mrs. B. S., Washington.—If you wish to adopt your deceased sister's children now living with your parents, we think you should make your application to the court setting up all the facts in your petition, and procuring the consent of the children's father, and the consent of your parents if the children now reside with them.

Mrs. M. R., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, his surviving widow is entitled to dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate and one-third of the personal estate, absolutely, and if there be no child nor descendant she would receive dower of one-half own right, if the state be a new acquisition, as against collateral heirs, but as against creditors one-third; if the estate be ancestral, to one-third of the personalty absolutely, and a one-third life estate in lands.

Mrs. M. A. J., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the real and personal property of a married woman shall, so long as she may choose, be and remain her separate property and under her control, and not subject to the debts of her husband; from your statements we think you would be very foolish to turn any of your property over to your husband.

Mrs. P. W. S., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of Kentucky, we are of the opinion that actions for the recovery of real estate must be brought within fifteen years, except that in cases of existing disabilities this time is extended for various periods depending upon the nature and extent of such disabilities, but in no case is such time extended beyond thirty years; In the case, however, of land which has been abandoned by its record owner a valid title can be acquired in much less time through tax sales of the same.

Mrs. T. S., North Dakota.—It is not the policy of this magazine to answer questions on divorce matters.

Mrs. E. S., Kentucky.—If, as we understand from your communication, the title of the real estate you mention stands in the name of the widow you mention, she can dispose of same as she may see fit without the consent of her children as the use of the words "heirs" in the deed to her only extends to such heirs a right to inherit the land from her in case they survive her and she does not dispose of the property during her lifetime, and dies without a will disposing of same.

H. E., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of either husband or wife, without a will, and leaving no child nor descendant the whole of the community property, and the whole of the separate personal estate goes to the survivor, but that such survivor would inherit only one-half of the separate real estate, the balance of such real estate going to decedent's parents, brothers, sisters or other heirs depending upon who is left.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. E. L. P., Marshville, N. C.—Have the birthmark removed by use of carbon dioxide snow. Of course your local doctor must apply the snow. The result will be all that you can desire.

Mrs. E. C. S., Needville, Texas.—Probably both you and your husband are suffering from malaria. Both of you take after meals two teaspoonfuls of Warburg's tincture well diluted. Also keep your bowels free and avoid sweets of all kinds.

Mrs. L. W., Upland, Ind.—The swelling of breasts at the period or a few days before is physiological (a harmless expression of Nature) and needs no treatment.

Miss G. L., Bristow, Okla.—One of the most frequent symptoms of highblood pressure is vertigo. Also fullness in the head with a feeling of pressure. If you have any doubt of your having a high-blood pressure have your blood-pressure taken, by your local doctor.

Miss V. Y., Green Ridge, Mo.—Apply Sloan's liniment to the shoulder. It is a neuritis. You can also use a hot flatiron applied over several thicknesses of flannel wrung out of hot mustard-water.

Miss D. B., Blue Rapids, Kansas.—Ulcer of the womb may be due to a chronic discharge. Better be treated locally and be cured.

Mrs. B. A., Aberdeen, South Dak.—For your rheumatic condition, take after meals a five-grain tablet of salicylate of sodium. Avoid sweets of all kinds, drink plenty of water.

Miss M. J., Brilliant, Ohio.—Asthma is a spasmodic trouble, and resembles the symptoms you give. You can take after meals a teaspoonful of pertussin well diluted.

Mrs. A. P. S., Wasco, Oregon.—You better take ten drops of syrup of iodide of iron well diluted after meals. This remedy will act favorably on the goitre that you seem to have.

Mrs F. M., Spring, W. Va.—Roaring in the ears is due as a rule to beginning catarrhal deafness. Have your mother consult some good aurist and be treated both for the catarrh and the head-noises.

Mrs. F. S., Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.—Of course a change to a dry climate will aid your catarrhal condition and indirectly help cure your ear trouble, which is undoubtedly due to catarrh of the nasal passages.

Miss H. M., Connersville, Ind.—The bladder condition has no relation to the hemorrhoidal condition. For the former take after meals a five-grain tablet of urotropin and drink plenty of water.

Mr. F. M, Spokane, Wash.—Have the prostate gland massaged. You can also take after meals a five-grain tablet of urotropin. If the prostate gland has become too large and there is constantly retention of urine an operation is indicated as the only way of obtaining permanent relief.

Mrs. C. W. M., Marion, N. Y.—You may have been torn during confinement. In this case you should consult some good surgeon and have the parts restored to normal. In the meantime you can take a tablespoonful of the following remedy; Basham's mixture well diluted after meals.

Mrs. J. L. P., Sparenburg, Texas.—A not uncommon accident during a difficult labor is a fracture of the coccyx-tip bone of the spine. This may be the case in your case. Have the coccyx examined and find out. If this is so, a small operation will help you. In the meantime have the spine and legs massaged as you have been doing.

Mrs. E. S., Altoona, Kansas.—Cure your catarrhal condition by using a spray of Dobell's solution three or four times a day. You can also use the same solution on the child's tongue and mouth.

Mr. A. E. K., Atkins, Texas.—If your wife has hemorrhoids that still trouble her have them removed by operation. If the lump in the breast is hard it should also be treated surgically.

Mrs. N. M. H., Petersburg, Va.—There is no sure cure for rheumatism of joints or other forms of rheumatism. You can apply to the joints a saturated solution of Epsom salts, and take after meals ten drops of a saturated solution of the iodide of potassium well diluted. Of course you must avoid sweets of all kinds and pastries as well.

For your constipation take two teaspoonfuls of fluid extract of cascara sagrada well diluted. You should also drink plenty of water, not less than two quarts a day.

Mrs. C. D., Lenox, Mass.—For the massage use cocoa butter and continue the supports as you have been doing. Size of the child causes laceration of the parts at birth, both external and internal. Operation is the only remedy for lacerations of the womb at confinement, or other parts. No tonic will be of any use, if there is a laceration. You can continue the tonic; but you should consult some good surgeon with a view of having the parts restored to normal—the sooner the better. Probably you have only symptoms due to laceration and not ovarian trouble; at least the ovarian trouble may be secondary.

60 Great Books FREE To COMFORT Club-raisers

ZANE Grey, James Oliver Curwood, Eleanor H. Porter and more than 40 others of the most popular and brilliant fiction writers of our day here offer COMFORT book lovers a list of masterpieces in thrilling tales of adventure, enchanting romance, glorious deeds and impelling loves. Every book here will entertain you from cover to cover.

G 2—Across the Years
Eleanor H. Porter
The stories which make up this book contain some of the most lovable characters and some of the best writing Mrs. Porter has done.

G 3—At the Foot of the Rainbow
Gene Stratton Porter
The scene of this charming, idyllic love story is laid in Central Indiana. The pathos and tender sentiment of this novel will endear it to all.

G 4—The Best Man
Grace Livingston Hill (Lutz)
In which the hero, under the impression he is acting as best man, realizes, when the ceremony is nearly over that he is being married.

G 5—The Big-Town Round-Up
William McLeod Raine
How Clay Lindsay of Arizona comes to New York and beats the big-town gunmen at their own game.

G 6—Brand Blotters
William McLeod Raine
A thrilling novel of the West, with love and hate, greed and revenge and courageous manliness.

G 7—The Branding Iron
Katharine Newlin Burt
To make her realize that he possessed her, he branded his wife as he would his cattle. A dramatic story, written in vivid and fascinating style.

G 8—The Brimming Cup
Dorothy Canfield
This book certainly deserves the sensation it created. It is the story of a problem which comes into the life of a happily married woman.

G 9—Crooked Trails and Straight
William McLeod Raine
A splendid Western story, made up of stirring exploits and exciting events, based upon the bitter enmity existing between the cattlemen and the sheepherders on the Arizona frontier.

G 10—Dangerous Days
Mary Roberts Rinehart
A brilliant study of married life. Mrs. Rinehart has written nothing that is more powerful in its appeal.

G 11—A Daughter of the Land
Gene Stratton-Porter
This is one of Mrs. Porter's most enjoable novels—against the background of Nature's beautiful outdoors.

G 12—Dawn of the Morning
Grace Livingston Hill
A story set in New York State, about 1826—quaint old days of poke bonnets and full skirts.

G 13—The Finding of Jasper Holt
Grace L. Hill (Lutz)
Written in Mrs. Hill's best manner and her heart and humor are on every page.

G 14—Freckles
Gene Stratton-Porter
Mere words cannot describe this genuine story. Its fame has spread far and wide.

G 15—The Harvester
Gene Stratton-Porter
Mrs. Porter has lavished upon this unique romance all the wealth of nature lore and nature love from her years of enthusiastic study.

G 19—Joyce of the North Woods
Harriet T. Comstock
A very beautiful woman, married to a drunken rascal, has an experience in an affair of the heart that carries her through joy, misery, the censure of friends and the reproach of her little world.

G 20—Judy of Rogues Harbor
Grace Miller White
The wilderness, mystery and brooding silence of the Storm Country, the land Mrs. White loves to write about, were never better portrayed. "Judy" is as appealing as "Tess" of the Storm Country.

G 21—Just David
This story of ten-year-old David who is left to the care of strangers,—gruff, stern farmer-folk in whom the warmth of kindness is buried deep, gives the spirit of happiness to the reader.

G 22—Just Patty
Jean Webster
"Just Patty" is bubbling over with the delicious humor of Patty in College. What Patty doesn't think of in the way of mischief at St. Ursula's, isn't worth thinking of.

G 23—"K"
Mary Roberts Rinehart
Sidney is a strong, beautiful girl training hard to become a nurse. Perhaps it is because she is so happy and so young that life suddenly begins to press in upon her.

G 24—Laddie
Gene Stratton-Porter
That touch of the "wild woods magic," the wholesome sentiment and the abundant humor which characterizes all of Mrs. Porter's books are prominent in this delightful romance.

G 25—Lo Michael
Grace L. Hill
A thrilling romance, full of adventure and spicy with the sweetest elements of young love and noble ambition brought to a happy fruition.

G 26—A Man Four-Square
Wm. MacLeod Raine
An engrossing story of a lovable "bad man." If you enjoy spirited action and a double love interest—this is the book for you.

G 27—Man to Man
Jackson Gregory
A tale of the Southwest, with all the dramatic and vigorous qualities of a Jackson Gregory novel.

Zane Grey's Famous Novels

Zane Grey has a grip upon the hearts and imaginations of his fellow countrymen such as few authors have ever attained. He has caught and immortalized the glory and romance of our pioneer days; and the spirit of the pioneer, living on in the hearts of Americans today, thrills to his epic tales. He is the supreme interpreter of the West to its own people and to the East—the West of the glorious days, of romance, of adventure. And not only the interpreter of the West to America, but to the outside world as well.

G 45—The Mysterious Rider
The great writer of Western romance at his best! Lovers of a splendid Western story will revel in its pages.

G 46—Man of the Forest
It is a tale of the glory of the mountains—of love and daring—and finally of a great joy, told only as Zane Grey could tell it.

G 47—The Desert of Wheat
A vigorous story of a man's fight to purge his blood of a hated taint. How he wins to victory, encouraged by a great love, makes a thrilling story.

G 48—The Border Legion
The heroine hears her fate is decided in a drinking and gambling orgy—and you'll hold your breath when you hear what it is.

G 49—Desert Gold
The ever fascinating and mysterious desert is the background; the story is full of stirring and dramatic incident.

G 50—The Light of Western Stars
Out under the wonderful Western stars, near the turbulent Mexican border, most of the action takes place.

G 51—The Lone Star Ranger
A breathless story of free border life—a picture of modern chivalry.

G 52—Riders of the Purple Sage
A romance of men who dared greatly and women who could both ride and love. A story of Utah when Mormon authority ruled unquestioned.

G 53—U. P. Trail, The
This book is the epic of a mighty episode in the history of this country, a tale of human passions at their best and basest.

G 54—Wildfire
The story of a wonderful horse. Like all of Zane Grey's novels, this one is straight, clean and exciting.

JAMES OLIVER Curwood's Gripping Stories of the Far North

G 1—Valley of Silent Men
A story of the Three River Country—a splendid romance of thrills and adventures. James Oliver Curwood knows the Canadian Northwest, and his stories of life and love in the wilds, of strong, rugged men and brave and tender women are masterpieces.

G 55—River's End
A story of the Royal Mounted Police—a story of adventure and a story of wonderful love.

Novels of Great Romance By Ethel M. Dell

There is "something" about Ethel M. Dell's style of writing which acts on her readers like a magnet. When they have read one of her stories they are sure—like Oliver Twist—to want more; in fact much more.

G 16—The Lamp in the Desert
One of the author's most intense and irresistible stories of great romance,—in which the lamp of love shines throughout the darkness of pain and sorrow.

G 17—The Top of the World
Sylvia Ingleton travels to South Africa expecting protection from her fiance, Guy Ranger, whom she has not seen for five years. Upon her arrival, she finds her lover has failed her.

G 18—Greatheart
Diana Bathurst escapes from her cruel, unloving mother for a time and lives in an enchanting whirl of social pleasures, in Switzerland. Then comes her great romance.

G 28—Marcia Schuyler
Grace Livingston Hill
Set in the times of full skirts and poke bonnets, this opens on the wedding preparations of the marriage of a winsome, willful Kate to a strong and good David.

G 29—Mavericks
Wm. MacLeod Raine
A thrilling story of a girl who, born and bred to the border life, looked level-eyed at its lovers and judged them by its outdoor tests of gameness.

G 30—Michael O'Halloran
Gene Stratton-Porter
Michael is a "newsie" small in size, but with big brain and common sense. Many other interesting people appear in this humorous love story.

G 31—North of Fifty-Three
B. W. Sinclair
The vivid story of a big, healthy, happy man whose home is in the wild and who helps to remove the scales of conventionality from the eyes of the woman he loves.

G 32—Oh, Money, Money!
Eleanor H. Porter
"If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Angie, the cheery philosopher. "Oh, Money! Money!" said is the keynote of the book.

G 33—Oh, You Tex!
Wm. MacLeod Raine
It is just the sort of an adventure tale for anyone who craves the excitement of the wild, free life of the old-time West.

G 34—Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm
Kate Douglas Wiggin
Mrs. Wiggin has never written a quainter story nor has she created a fresher and more subtly-conceived character. "Rebecca" is almost a national character.

G 35—Road to Understanding, The
Eleanor H. Porter
Burke defied his father and gave up his home to marry Helen, whose pretty face had attracted him.

G 36—The Rosary
Florence L. Barclay
Once in a generation there appears a story like "The Rosary" in which there is but one adventure; the great passion of two real persons.

G 37—The Secret of the Storm Country
Grace Miller White
Passing years and the friendship of cultured folk work a great transformation in Tess of the Storm Country. The love into her life the secret upon which the story is built.

G 38—The Shadow of the Sheltering Pines
Grace Miller White
This is a love story that all readers of "The Storm Country" books will be sure to enjoy.

G 39—Six Star Ranch
Eleanor H. Porter
An account of the manner in which the "Happy Hexpot" spent in Texas at "Six Star Ranch." A chronicle of young girlhood in which there is a world of fun and inspiration.

G 40—The Story of Julia Page
Kathleen Norris
Can a girl, bred in sordid conditions, surrounded by sordid ideals, lift herself to a higher plane of life? This was the problem of Julia Page.

G 41—A Texas Ranger
Wm. MacLeod Raine
The sharp, clear character drawing, the swift rush of the absorbing plot, the free, full humor of the frontier, lend its usual charm to the book.

G 42—The Tie That Binds
Eleanor H. Porter
A book filled with happiness and tenderness and the qualities that have made the Porter books famous throughout the world.

G 43—The Valley of the Giants
Peter B. Kyne
A great romance against the background of the California Redwoods. A story of big men and big women in a big country.

G 44—When Patty Went to College
Jean Webster
A bright, whimsical and thoroughly entertaining story by the author of "Daddy Long Legs." "Patty" is famous as a delightful character.

G 56—The Golden Snare
James Oliver Curwood
Philip Raine of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police finds a wonderful girl. Their experiences make a gripping tale.

Feature Photoplays Have Been Made From These Titles

G 57—When Knighthood Was in Flower
Charles Major
A great romance of the days of chivalry.

G 58—Manslaughter
Alice Duer Miller
Through her successful novels, magazine stories, screen and stage productions, Alice Duer Miller has won a great following. Her breezy, animated style captivates the reader.

G 59—Kindred of the Dust
Peter B. Kyne
This gripping romance is one of Kyne's most appealing tales.

G 60—Tess of the Storm Country
Grace Miller White
Tess, a fisherman's daughter, loves a university student of aristocratic traditions. Mary Pickford's greatest achievement is her screen portrayal of "Tess."

WE hear and read about June brides but there is never a word about June bridegrooms and I'm sure there must be just as many of them as there are brides. Apropos of brideoms here is a little nonsense-poem I shamely borrowed from the Ladies' Home Jour-, just because it amused me and because nought it might amuse someone else.

"Said a bridegroom, a trifle blase,
'I wonder if marriage will pay.'
"Well," he thought with a smile,
As he walked up the aisle,
"Twill break in my new shoes anyway."

—Carolyn Wells.

. G., KENTUCKY.—I can't advise you to act trary to your mother's wishes but neither could lame you if you did. She promised her consent your marriage if you would wait one year and months, and she should keep her promise. You y have antagonized (much nicer word than riled) by talking too much about it. Let the matter p until the end of that time and see if she doesn't d gracefully, provided you are still of the same d. But don't get married if you are only sixn or seventeen years old. You didn't give your UFFERING WIFE, NEW JERSEY.—My dear wo-n, haven't you ever heard that "there is no fool an old fool?" No, I'm not calling your hus-d a fool; I'd get myself disliked if I did, but r and wiser men than he have fallen for flattery n a young woman. Middle and old age has a uliar effect upon some people. Perhaps if I e a psychologist I might explain it, but I'm not. ist know that it does. A permanent wave or a petticoat suffices for some women while others a step further and indulge in a wild love affair, ally with a young man, all depending upon the re time and circumstances of each individual. len hate to admit, even to themselves, that y are growing old and their vanity is so great t even a little attention from a young woman conces them they are regular young fellows, one the boys, when all the time their rheumatism ps telling them differently, but what's rheuman to a final fling at youth? Of course your hus-d loves you, the years together of your married proves that. Don't take him so seriously but gh at him and with him over his flirtation and thankful that it is no worse. Remember, "men only boys grown tall," and you wouldn't have ded if your little boy, or any little boy, made eve he was a soldier or anything else, would ? Your husband was just making believe he young and fascinating. Any woman could e flattered him while he was in that frame of d, and he wasn't a bit in love with this particuwoman but just in love with himself. Don't it worry you any more. Be glad that he has it out of his system and can settle down to a sible old age.

NNIE, NORTH CAROLINA.—Are you the "GenAnnie" of springtime fame? So glad to know . It is unfortunate that you told this girl so y of your secrets and now that she isn't your nd any more, she should tell them to others. an't be helped, only to teach you a lesson. Reber this:

"Never get too intimate
With your friends,
They may some day
Be your enemies;
Never be too hard
On your enemies,
They may some day
Be your friends."

. R., ARKANSAS.—If you are five feet tall and gh 125 pounds, you weigh enough and shouldn't any fatter unless you are ambitious to be a fat y in a circus. You really weigh too much now. wever, I can send you a list of fattening foods ou insist. (2). It is customary to wait until receive a reply before writing again but if you e reason to believe your first letter was never eived, it would be proper to write again. A boy be a Christian without being a goody-good. you dislike that kind why do you write to him?

MARJORIE, TENNESSEE.—It is impossible for to fathom the workings of this boy's mind but m of the opinion that if he cared very much for he would call again and not be content to get information second hand. A warmed over love ist be something like a warmed over popover, t it may be that he has never ceased to love you. nether or not you receive the attentions of anher man during the absence of your fiance is nething you and he will have to decide for yourves. I'm a firm believer in equal rights myself. es he go around with other girls when is is away m you?

ARBUTUS, PA.—Since he worries you by being untruthful you had better put him out of your mind. Worry means ill health and wrinkles, and no man is worth either. (2). There are ways of changing the shapes of noses—so the advertisements say—but I can't vouch for them personally. I'm not so keen about the shape of my own nose but so long as it continues to smell for me and doesn't sneeze too often, I'll let it remain as it is. Better leave yours alone. I like turned up noses; they are so religious, always looking toward Heaven.

SWEET WILLIAM, GEORGIA.—Thanks for the kind wishes, but I don't want a nice bachelor or widower to bring me a box of candy Sunday or any other day. I might consider a string of pearls, or an automobile or a diamond ring or some trifle like that, but no man is going to waste my time talking about himself and expect to make it right with a box of candy. I can get all the candy I want in the five and ten cent stores and besides, it makes me fat and I don't eat it anyway. You are too anxious to get a man and thus frighten him away. Try being indifferent, a little diffident, retiring, and see if the men will follow you; they like to chase. It won't drive them away as quickly as being too sweet to them. It is the man that counts, not how near or how far away he is. I hope there isn't any chance of a man from a matrimonial agency coming to see you. You'll get yourself in a fine mess if you fool around with matrimonial agencies.

MILDRED, WISCONSIN.—Bashfulness may be an obstacle, as you say, but it is one you are not likely to encounter. I don't know what you mean by "stepping" but whatever it is I don't approve of it if you have to meet a boy secretly in order to "step." Why all the secrecy if your mother has no objection to you having boy callers at your home? You are years too young, but if she thinks it is all right I don't suppose I can say anything. Don't fool yourself into thinking that "mother" will like you because "son" does. When mother's heart is set on another girl for son, and you take her place, she isn't going to receive you with open arms, take you to her heart and all that sort of thing that we read about but seldom see. She may grow to like you. If you were older I would say have nothing more to do with him until he was willing to brave his mother's displeasure and meet you openly, but because of your extreme youth the affair is likely to be a thing of the past by the time this is printed.

BLACKIE AND BROWNIE, NEW MEXICO.—I wish girls would give the nationality of the man involved when they ask about marrying foreigners. There are foreigners and foreigners. The men you mention seem all right, on paper, but I'd want to know more about them before advising you further. At any rate don't act hastily. Better to wait a year or two and be sure than to marry soon and be sorry ever after.

PAT, N. CAROLINA.—I realize that, living in a small town, you will get yourself talked about if you go around with more than one fellow, but that is to be preferred rather than marrying the wrong man just because he got to be a habit. You needn't overdo the matter by having a different one every night, but just enough to keep you from settling down to one until you find the right one.

DADDY'S PET, VIRGINIA.—You asked seven questions,—too many, so I'll answer the one that interested me most. "Is it proper for a girl to love her fellow's neck while he is driving the car or let him love her while she drives?" I can understand loving a fellow's eyes or his wavy hair or his collar or chin, but his neck—ugh—with a horrid Adam's Apple playing tag with itself all up and down it! There's no accounting for tastes, and if you do show such poor judgment as to love his neck, why not be constant in your misplaced affections and love it when he isn't driving or can't you see it so well when the car is in motion? As for the girl driving while the fellow makes love to her, it is dangerous. Better stop the car,—that may be dangerous too, but it doesn't involve the lives of pedestrians and other automobilists. By the way, the accent is on the "mo" and not the "bil" as so many people say it. (2) A boy sits beside a girl, not beside of her. Be more careful of your grammar as well as of your morals.

LUCY, ARK; L. C. W., KY; FRECKLES, MO; BLUE BIRD, KY, AND BARBARA, VIVIAN AND SHIRLEY, TEXAS.—Your questions have been forwarded to the Etiquette Department for answer. That's where they belong. I'm long on morals but short on some of the finer points of etiquette. I always remember to say, "Thank You" though.

ETHEL, ILLINOIS.—Three moves in three weeks would mean a delay in mail, unless you were most careful about giving forwarding addresses. It would be proper to write a short letter explaining the situation.

I, NORTH CAROLINA.—You are too young to get married, and even if you were older you shouldn't marry a man in whom you have so little faith. A number of wives lose faith in their husbands after marriage, but think how sad it must be not to have any to lose. Think of all the pleasures you'd lose by not being able to be miserable.

MATTIE, ARK.—It is difficult to drive any man, and a husband most of all, but most of them can be led if it is gone about in the right way. If he won't go out with you, talk to him kindly and effect a compromise. If a man is wise he will go out with his wife if she wants him to. It doesn't take long for her to get so she doesn't care whether he goes or not.

DEWDROP, HAWAII.—If you really love him and he has apologized sufficiently, don't let your foolish pride stand in the way of your happiness. Take him back and marry him if you find he is worth while. But don't get the idea that you aren't worthy of him. That's all nonsense. Imagine sending advice to Hawaii. I wish I could send myself instead. Have always wanted to go there. Maybe I shall someday. Who knows?

BLUE AND BROWN EYES, WYOMING.—Most assuredly it isn't worth while trying to regain the love of a man who deserts you two months before your marriage to him. Be thankful it happened two months before and not two months after.

Sincerely yours,
COUSIN MARION.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

Mrs. W. L. G., Inman, S. C.—If sisters' children are first cousins, you will readily see that the children of these first cousins will bear to each other the relationship of second cousins. The next generation would be third cousins, and so on down the years.

L. D., Trion, Ga.—As your violin is stamped "German Manufacture," you can feel certain that it is not the work of that old master fiddle maker of Italy, Stradivarius. The inscription placed on the inside of the instrument is doubtless playfully or fraudulently inserted to give an appearance of age to the violin and delude the inexpert or credulous buyer.

Mrs. R. G., Beaumont, Texas.—You live in a large and thriving city, and we feel sure that the laboratory f oone of your local high schools would be able to pass upon any stone or pebble you wish identified as to its composition and value. Ask the principal of the school about this. If your specimen is beyond the school's range in mineralogy, he will be able to tell you where to send your specimen.

Mrs. M. P. R., South Carolina.—You may address Henry Ford at Dearborn, Michigan. (2) Because of his advanced age, John D. Rockefeller spends the greater part of his time in seclusion at his country place at Pocantico Hills, N. Y. A letter so addressed will reach him, or rather the hands of his secretary.

Miss I. T., Waverly, Iowa.—Your Commissioner of Charities in your state, or other like official, would be the proper authority from whom to obtain a list of the children's homes in your section of our big country.

Mrs. C. H. T., Geddes, S. D.—As we have often stated here, there has developed a flourishing trade in the making of fraudulent "old violins." These are marked with an inscription which is calculated to make the credulous buyer believe he is obtaining an instrument which is the handiwork of one of the old masters of violin-making. As the famous Italian maker Stradivarius is the best-known of these old-time craftsmen, it is his name which most often appears. The fact is that there are only about thirty genuine Strads remaining in existence, and these are all in the hands of collectors and museums. We believe that your violin is only another of the many faked instruments concerning which we hear every month from some of COMFORT's readers.

Mrs. N. A., Melissa, Texas.—Our present method of reckoning time, known as the Gregorian Calendar, was introduced into England and her colonies in 1752. There is now a difference of thirteen days between the new way of reckoning and the old Julian Calendar. This variation was but eleven days when the change was made in 1752, and September 3 was called September 14 by the new time-fixers. We are unable to tell you where you might obtain a copy of a calendar bearing the old reckoning. These are doubtless rather scarce articles today. (2) February 22, 1790, was a Monday.

E. J. M., Okemah, Okla.—See reply to Miss I. T., Waverly, Iowa, in this column.

Mrs. G. E. J., Elva, Ky.—You could not be successful in "painting a glass" and making by this means a homemade mirror. The silvering of a mirror is a difficult job requiring expert hands and the use of expensive materials. This is why a good quality looking-glass cannot be cheaply purchased.

LITTLE BOY, PONTOTOC, Miss.—Of the four states you mention, Arkansas is the only one having any vacant public land at this time. There are some 257,000 acres of this, but none of these acres are the location you wish. The U. S. Land Office controlling the land nearest your requirements is located at Harrison, Arkansas. Write to the Register there for rules governing entry of such lands by homesteaders.

A Subscriber, Broadlands, Ill. As you mailed this watch, as you say, by insured parcel post, and you still have your receipt given by the postmaster at the time of mailing, you should be able to recover on the lost package. Have you taken this matter up with your local post office in the way we state. We cannot understand how your postmaster can say he "can do nothing", if you mailed your package insured. If he will not help you, write to the Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. J. L. R., Mexia, Texas.—We think your newly organized sewing club can dispense with the appointing of a chairman at meeting when the president of the club is present and could preside. In such an informal organization as your social club will really be, the president's duties would be slight. She would preside over the meetings, announce future places and times of gatherings, would offer topics affecting the club for discussion and vote, etc. The secretary's duties would amount to little more than sending out notices of meetings, and if these are arranged for at a previous gathering this will become almost superfluous. We are taking for granted that no minutes of your meeting will be kept, as your club is one of handiwork. You would need a treasurer, however, if you are to have a system of dues and fines, as your letter states. We think your initiation fee rather small, and also the sum you have decided upon as a fine for absence. Surely a treasurer's duties would be slight if you hold to these small amounts! Accumulated funds might be dispensed, we think, in some social gathering the club might give, or they could be used for charitable purposes. Your club is a good idea; you are undertaking its organization in a businesslike manner, and we wish you success.

T. L., Indian Mound, Tenn.—The small pearls often found in the eating of oysters are of little or no value. Probably the frying of your pearl accounts for its smoky hue. Any jeweler could tell you if your cooked gem was of any marketable value—which we doubt.

Mrs. G. L. D., Airy, Ga.—See reply to Mrs. G. E. J., Elva, Ky., in this issue.

Mrs. D. Mc C., Fairpoint, S. Dak.—A judge of violins would have to pass upon your fifty year old instrument with inspection and test before its value and real age could be established. See reply to Mrs. C. H. T., Geddes, S. D., in this issue.

M. B., Columbus, Ind.—There is not much to choose between a St. Bernard and a Newfoundland dog as a farm pet in a home where there are two children. Both breeds are gentle. The St. Bernard runs slightly heavier and the rough-coated is preferable, we think, to the smooth-haired variety of the breed. Personally we believe the St. Bernard to be a little slower in action and not as good to look at as a Newfoundland. The latter has an inherited fondness for water and has a coat which is resistant to moisture. We think your children might be better pleased with a Newfoundland, all things considered. The Whitestar Kennels, Long Branch, N. J., raise both these breeds of dogs for sale.

C. R., Aliceville, Ala.—Our old and playful enemy the bedbug, is able to stick around old houses indefinitely. Coal strikes and absence of furnace heat do not trouble the enduring cimex lectularius, as scientists have dignifiedly called him. Also when there is nothing to eat, the bedbug is again enduring and long suffering. He tightens up his belt end, camps beneath a bit of wall paper until a bite comes along after a year or two. We received this unwelcome guest from Europe many decades ago, a route from which other evils have reached our once happier shores. Remove the old paper from the walls of this house and burn it. Go over all walls, woodwork and floors with a liberal brushing of gasolene—being careful of fire while using this inflammable liquid. It would be helpful in the extermination of the pest if you painted your walls—leaving any papering for another year. Diluted corrosive sublimate is also useful as a remedy, and pyrethrum powder can be used locally in beds and on bedding. In cases where the infestation is a serious one, the rooms may be fumigated with sulphur, or with bisulphide of carbon. Thoroughness is of importance, as the young of the lively insect hatch in eight days. Any missed mean a new generation in a short time.

Mrs. G. W., West Bowdoin, Me.—In checkers a man can jump a king at any time the opportunity offers—it being understood, of course, that the man must make the jump in his own proper direction, and that he cannot jump backwards, as in the privilege of a king. (2) Technically A can pick up B's man when B has had the opportunity to jump and has not done so, but in actual play it's customary to call the opponent's attention to the fact that he must make the jump if he has failed to notice the proximity of the pieces.

An Everpointed Pencil For Only One Subscription

Reward No. 8851

The American public and COMFORT's million readers have waited a long time for this perfect writing pencil. Without hesitation we can pronounce the Everpointed, the newest product of the American Pencil Company, the most superior self-pointing pencil on the market.

In appearance it looks like solid gold but is not gold nor is it brass. It is "gilt nickle," the latest metallic substance. The more you carry it the brighter it gets. It cannot wear out nor can it wear off. With its delicate chasing and flashing jeweled top it makes one of the most beautiful pencils you ever saw.

It is as useful as it is beautiful. If you carry an Everpointed your lead is always sharp. No more soiled fingers. No more whittling. The Everpointed is always ready for use. Nothing to get out of order. It writes right every time. A slight turn and a fresh lead is ever ready.

Twelve perfect universal size leads—sixteen inches of lead in all—are contained in the magazine under the top—enough for a year's ordinary use. New leads are simply pushed in from the front, as illustrated. A convenient eraser is also concealed under the cap.

The Everpointed comes in two lengths, one of 5½ inches for men, with a safety clip; the other 4 inches for women. Specify which model you prefer.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50c we will send you an Everpointed pencil by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8851.

Three Sauce Pans of Pure Aluminum

Reward No. 9183

For Only Three Subscriptions

COMFORT's host of housewives and cooks who like the clean, silver-bright appearance of aluminum will delight in preparing their meals with this handsome three-piece set of pure aluminum sauce or cooking pans.

No housewife ever seems to have too many sauce pans around the kitchen and with such useful sizes as 1½ and 2 quart—she will hardly get a meal in which she does not use one or more of them.

Everyone knows how light in weight pure aluminum is but how obstinately it resists wear. The aluminum in this three-piece Set which we illustrate weighs less than a pound but it is heavy enough and thick enough to give years of steady service. They are seamless, sanitary, and easy to keep clean, and will not crackle, chip, or peel.

You will like the handles too. Notice how convenient they are and how firmly they are riveted to the pan.

It will take you but a few minutes to get this reward. You will enjoy using it for years. The following special offer makes it easy for you.

Given To You! For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you free by parcel post prepaid, three Aluminum Sauce Pans. Reward No. 9183.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

26-Piece Table Set

GIFT NO. 7625

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a reward for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every set sent out for a period of five years.

THESE handsome silver birthstone rings are the very latest. Every woman or girl who wants to be in style should wear one. Each ring is guaranteed sterling silver, with attractively designed open work, beautifully executed and finished. The imt. gems are perfectly cut, unusually deep, with that rare brilliancy so seldom found except in rings of the very highest quality. The twelve different gems and their corresponding months are as follows:

January, Garnet; February, Amethyst; March, Bloodstone; April, Diamond; May, Emerald; June, Agate; July, Ruby; August, Sardonyx; September, Sapphire; October, Opal; November, Topaz; December, Turquoise.

Heretofore the prices of solid silver rings have been too high to permit us to make an offer of this kind and it is only by a fortunate purchase of a large quantity of them taken in one lot that we are able to make the offer now. Don't delay if you want one of these handsome and stylish rings—we may not be able to secure any more of them at a reduced price. We will send you your choice of these rings if you will send us two subscriptions.

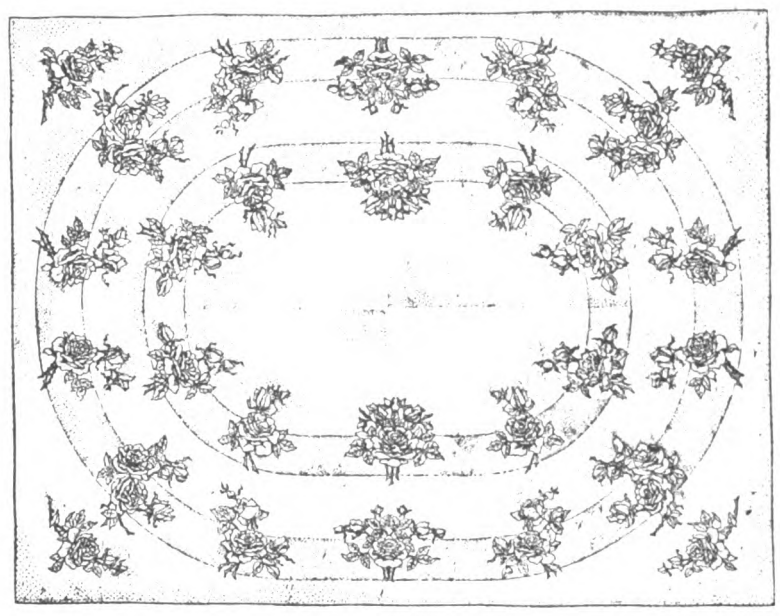
Opera or Field Glasses

GIFT NO. 1232
Given for Two Subscriptions.

THESE glasses are not, of course, as powerful as those sold at a high price, yet they will be found very satisfactory and extremely useful on many occasions. Although commonly known as opera glasses, they can also be used out of doors for identifying people, animals and objects within a reasonable distance. Farmers, motorists, Boy Scouts, hunters, fishermen, etc., will find these glasses to be just what they need to take with them on their trips through fields and woods. They are durably made and can be conveniently carried in the neat leatherette case which is included free.

These Glasses are made in Europe which accounts for the low price that makes this offer possible.

The Latest Vanity Case



Reward No. 1152

For A Club Of Two

EVERY woman and girl who likes to keep up with the styles should have one of these handsome, embossed silver finish Vanity Cases. It is the very latest design, having a thin model case like that of a thin model watch, is very light, weighing a little over two ounces, and of good size—3¾ inches long and 2½ inches wide. The chain is twelve inches long. Inside the case is a fine little mirror and two dainty powder puffs. This new Vanity Case is one of the prettiest designs we have yet seen so we have purchased a quantity of them to give away among COMFORT readers.

Six Snowy White Napkins

Gift No. 8294
SIX GIVEN FOR FOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS

Before selecting these napkins for our club raisers we compared price and quality of several big cotton mills to be sure to get only the finest grade and most serviceable quality. In this gift our club raisers will find a napkin that is good enough for those happy occasions when they bring out the best dishes, the most precious silverware and the cherished china; yet a every-day, hard-usage napkin is wanted—here it is. They are made of carefully selected bleached cotton yarns compactly woven with a beautiful floral design. Each napkin when cut and finished will measure 18 inches square. Two sides come with the selvage edges. We do not know how long we can continue to offer these six napkins on such liberal terms so we recommend that you send in your order at once.

EVERYTHING GIVEN TO YOU

You can have any gift on this page if you will send us the required number of subscriptions. Look the gifts over, make your selection and then send us the number of yearly subscriptions called for at 50c a year. If a gift calls for only one subscription that subscription can not be your own. Your own subscription, though, counts one in any club of two or more. All gifts sent free and prepaid.

Poultry Farming for Women

The chick as a whole appears more or less anæmic and emaciated, the muscles of the wings, breast and legs may be almost completely wasted away.

Summary of Points to be Remembered

1—The original source of infection is the ovary of the mother hen.

2—Eggs from infected hens contain the organism in the yolks.

3—Chicks produced from infected eggs have the disease when hatched.

4—The disease may be spread through the medium of infected food and water. Hence normal chicks may acquire it by picking up infected droppings, or food contaminated thereby.

5—Infection from chick to chick cannot, apparently, take place after they are three or four days of age.

6—As a rule, infected chicks make less satisfactory growth than those that are apparently normal. For some time they appear stunted and weak, but may eventually undergo more or less complete development.

7—The female chicks which survive often harbor the infection and may become bacillus carriers. Infection in the breeding pens is perpetuated in this manner.

8—In all probability infection does not pass from adult to adult.

9—Infected hens are apparently poor layers, especially in their second and subsequent laying periods.

Practical Suggestions

It is of the greatest importance that the poultryman learns to recognize bacillary white diarrhea, both through external symptoms and post-mortem appearances of diseased chicks. The mere discharge of whitish material from the vent is not in itself proof that the chicks are affected with this special disorder.

Infected hens should be eliminated from the breeding pens. Such elimination is made possible by pedigree records of chicks. If the eggs from the different pens are hatched separately, and the chicks segregated for the first few days, it will soon be made apparent from the condition of the chicks, which pens contain infected hens. This may prove effectual in cases where infection has not become general. To determine which individual hens are infected, the trap nest should be used, and the same general producer followed.

Another possible means of determining infection of breeding hens is the direct examination of the ovaries. It is entirely practicable through an opening in the side of the bird similar to that made in caponizing. Where the abnormal condition is marked it may be easily detected.

In case infection exists, and it is not practicable to determine the breeders which are infected, the entire flock should be discarded for breeding purposes, and eggs for hatching secured from flocks which have been tested and found free from disease.

As to the means of preventing infection from chick to chick, keep the incubator dark from the time the chicks commence to hatch, as that will prevent them picking at the droppings, and then keep the chicks in small flocks for the first four days.

Since infected chicks make unsatisfactory development for the first few weeks, and may later regain vigor and make fair growth, it is advisable to select at an early age those intended for breeding purposes. The selection may be made when the chickens are from eight to ten weeks of age, reserving only those which show the greatest vigor and development.

Food and water should be supplied in such a manner as to prevent contamination from infected droppings. The use of fine absorptive litter in the brooder, especially for the first few days, is also advisable.

The feeding of sour milk may prove very effective as a preventive measure. The milk must be fed early, or during the infection stage. After the white diarrhea organism has entered the general circulation such treatment is of little or no value. Hence, sour milk should not be looked on as a cure, but only as a possible preventive.

Correspondence

Subscribers are entitled to advice of our Poultry Editor free, through the columns of this department. Address Poultry Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. BE SURE to give your full name and address, otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

F. M.—This is a very odd case. You say that each time you have brought a fresh lot of hens on the place, their eggs would be all right for a time, but that later they have all laid eggs with such an offensive odor that you could not use them. You don't tell me what you feed. Is it possible that you have been using fish or meat scraps which have been kept too long? Perhaps, as the birds have been on free range, they find some strong scented weed. Is there any great quantity of wild onion on the farm? Does the outbreak of bad eggs always occur at the same season of the year? If so, it may be caused by some commercial fertilizer that you are using on the land. I should like very much to hear from you again. Try and give me some general information about how you feed, and what drinking water the birds have access to when at large.

J. R. M.—Dissolve half a teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium flakes in a quart of water. Stir until dissolved, and keep in a bottle for use. To treat the birds, dilute one tablespoonful of the lotion with two tablespoonfuls of water. Bathe the head, and spray the mouth and throat. If you have no means of spraying, take a stiff wing feather, thoroughly wet it with the diluted lotion, and swab out the bird's mouth and throat, allowing some of it to drop into the eyes, and the two small holes at the base of the bill. To prevent contagion spreading, remove all the infected birds and confine them by themselves.

M. W.—I think that this must have been a very severe outbreak of fungoid, which sometimes develop among birds which have been given too much rich, starchy food. Once established, it quickly passes from bird to bird. You were very wise to take the trouble in hand at once, and your treatment was good, though rather severe. If you have any further trouble of a like nature, instead of coal oil, use permanganate of potassium or carbolic vaseline. Read answer to J. R. M.

H. H.—The birds would have been all right for table use, for, without doubt, the small scab which you describe, was nothing but the result of some injury to the outer skin over the crop. As you say that two of the other roosters had the same sort of scabs in about the same position, I advise you to look over the roosts or any place they are in the habit of flying up to that has caused the trouble.

A. F. W.—Clean and whitewash coops, use a good insect powder on the birds themselves. Give them three applications, with three days between each. Read the article at the beginning of the department this month.

F. J.—Very few people try hatching goose eggs in incubators, for it is usually not successful in the ordinary small incubator. It is better to trust the first eggs to a motherly old hen, and let the goose set on the later ones. If, however, you are determined to try the incubator, heat it up the same as for hens' eggs, but the length of time the eggs are cooled each day should be much longer. After the eighteenth day, they should be cooled until a thermometer placed on the eggs will register 85 or even 80. When the eggs begin to pip the temperature in the incubator may run up to 106 or 107, because the animal heat from the goslings' bodies is so much greater than that from chicks. There will be no danger so long as it does not go above 107. Goose eggs require a great deal more moisture. As you have a hygrometer, supply a sufficient amount of moisture to keep it from one to two degrees higher than when incubating hens' eggs. When the machine is filled with hens' eggs, the hygrometer should register 75 degrees of moisture the first week; the second week 70 or a little under; third week from 48 to 50 degrees; the nineteenth day about 44 degrees.

R. S. D.—Wyandottes, Rhode Island Reds and Plymouth Rocks are all good general purpose birds. I cannot recommend breeders in this column.

The Modern Farmer

10 lbs. Sudan grass with 2 bu. Hollybroods.....4.30 tons
10 lbs. Sudan grass with 2 bu. Manchus.....4.69 tons

Judging from these tests, it is apparent that when the seeding rate for either soy beans or peas is increased to more than 2 bushels per acre, the hay crop shows a decrease of from one-fourth to one-half a ton or more. Seeding 2 bushels or slightly less gives the highest yields. From the standpoint of economy lighter seeding is also best.

How Much Feed?

The cost of feeding farm animals is a subject discussed wherever and whenever farmers get together. Due to varying prices of grain and hay in different parts of the country, and at different seasons of the year it is impossible to give accurate data in dollars. But it is possible to give facts relative to the amounts of feed required to fatten a carload of cattle, hogs or sheep, for example. This matter has received the careful attention of the Department of Agriculture, which has issued the following statement:

Six hundred bushels of corn and seventeen tons of hay fatten 250 lambs weighing 55 pounds each, bringing them to an average selling weight of 80 pounds. A double deck carload holds 250 lambs.

The amount of feed required to increase the weight of 70 hogs—a carload—from 100 pounds to 200 pounds is 450 bushels of corn and 2,750 pounds of tankage or fish meal.

To fatten an average carload of 20 steers, weighing 850 pounds, 1,100 bushels of corn, ten tons of alfalfa hay and five tons of straw are required to make an average gain of 325 pounds in 180 days.

Grow More Mangles

Heavy yields of succulence of fine quality entitle mangels to far more attention than they now receive on the part of farmers who have cattle to carry over winter. Poultry keepers also can well afford to raise them for winter feed, to be cut in half lengthwise and stuck on spikes in the scratch house where fowls may help themselves in a manner not so wasteful as is the case when fed chopped.

Mangels will grow on any land that will grow potatoes, corn or any of the small grain crops, provided the soil is reasonably fertile and well drained. It is essential that the ground be thoroughly prepared and the field disked and harrowed before planting. The seed is usually sown at the rate of 5 pounds to the acre. When the seed germinates and the plantlets can be seen in the rows, harrow lengthwise of the rows, tilting the teeth of a fine tooth harrow back so that the soil is lightly stirred and the weeds killed without injuring the little plants.

Later thin out the plants to leave one plant every 10 to 12 inches in the row. The work of thinning is very important and should be done when plants have six or eight leaves. Cultivation is important; frequent cultivation is necessary to keep weeds under control and to maintain a loose and friable surface soil that will retain moisture. If grown on a small scale, mangels may be planted in the kitchen garden and handled much the same as table beets, then stored in the cellar or in an empty stall in the barn until needed for use in the poultry house or for cattle feed. As a supplementary succulent feed for dairy cows, sliced mangels will take the place of corn silage almost pound for pound. They are palatable, create appetite, promote good digestion and serve to tone up the entire system. From 20 to 25 per day is an average ration, fed twice daily sprinkled with bran or ground oats or some other concentrate.

Beware of Exhaust Gases

It is quite generally known that the exhaust gases from internal combustion engines are poisonous. Yet we frequently read in the newspapers reports that somebody has been asphyxiated by remaining in a closed garage or other building while the engine of their automobile was running; exhaust gases, finding no ready outlet through open door or windows, soon make the confined air deadly for those who breathe it. Recently we saw a particularly sad report of the death of a father and little child. The little one went to the garage to "He'p Daddy fis a tar". Half an hour later, when the work should have been completed, the man's wife went to the garage to investigate into the cause of the delay. On opening the door she found her husband and child already beyond help—the mute proof of the deadliness of exhaust fumes.

Every owner of a stationary engine or tractor also should know of the dangerous nature of exhaust gases. For real safety, no engine should ever be operated where the gases are exhausted inside a building. They are not only deadly to human beings, but to farm animals as well. Cases are on record where livestock confined in barns have been killed by the fumes from internal combustion engines used for grinding feed or similar purposes, simply because the engine seemed small and harmless, and the owner had not gone to the trouble of connecting the exhaust pipe to the outside.

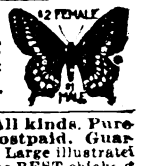
The remedy in all cases is simple and easy, for all that is necessary is to extend the exhaust pipe through the side of the building and let the gases escape into the open air. Where that plan is not practicable, ample ventilation should be provided by opening doors and windows whenever the engine is used; but the latter method does not always give sufficient ventilation, as a small percentage of the gas is deadly.

The poisonous gas from engine exhaust is usually carbon monoxide. This quick acting and deadly gas has no odor to indicate its presence, if pure; only when exhaust fumes also contain smoke from burning lubricating oil does the air become offensive. Many owners or operators of automobiles, tractors or stationary engines owe a great debt to smoky exhaust fumes, for they perhaps would have been overcome but for the stifling smoke. When carbon monoxide is being exhausted pure and unmixed with smoke into an unventilated building the victim usually does not know that he is being overcome until he feels himself fainting. Then it is usually too late to reach fresh air or even call for help. Death follows promptly.

Keep these facts in mind. Safeguard the lives of children and farm hands, as well as your own, by seeing that exhaust fumes are always piped to exhaust in the open air.

Science's Discovery Routs Chicken Lice

Mineralized Water Gets Rid of Dusting & Spraying — Birds Delouse Themselves. Fine for Baby Chicks and All Poultry.



A recent discovery promises to revolutionize all the commonly accepted methods for keeping poultry free from lice and mites. This wonderful product keeps the poultry always lice-free without the poultry raiser doing any work. It is the simplest, easiest, surest and best method ever discovered.

Hick's Lice-Go, which is the name of this remarkable lice remedy, is dropped in the chicks' drinking water. Taken into the system of the bird, it comes out through the oil glands of the skin and every louse or mite leaves the body. It is guaranteed to help the hatchability of the eggs and cannot injure the flavor of the eggs or meat; is harmless to chicks and does not affect the plumage. A few days treatment at the start and then a little added to the drinking water each month is all that is necessary.

Send No Money—just your name and address to Chas. M. Hick & Company, Dept. 311, 1018 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. A card will do. Mr. Hick is so confident that Hick's Lice-Go will get rid of every louse or mite that he will send you two large double strength $1.00 packages for the price of one. When they arrive, pay postman only $1.00 and postage. Sell one to your neighbor and get yours free. If you are not absolutely satisfied after 30 days trial, your money will be refunded. This offer is guaranteed by two big Chicago banks, who say that Mr. Hick will do exactly as he agrees without question or argument. Write today before this remarkable trial offer is withdrawn.

Questions and Answers

PRUNING FLOWERING SHRUBS.—Some of my flowering bushes, lilacs, bridal wreath, spirea, etc., will need to be pruned this year as they are growing too large. How and when should the work be done? E. E. T., W. Va.

A.—Nurserymen tell us to "Prune all flowering shrubs as soon as the blossoms fall, provided they bloom before the First of June." This rule is a good one to follow. Avoid topping except for roses. Never prune with the idea of restricting the normal growth of the plant, but rather to encourage natural development in both form and size. Better transplant to a new location next year, where there is ample room, than attempt to make a large grower remain small. Cut out the old wood of shrubs that have flowered already; do this early in June. By cutting the old wood about four inches above ground, and leaving the new wood untouched, next year's crop of blossoms will not be curtailed. Early pruning is advised for the simple reason that, if pruning is delayed until fall, it is difficult to tell the old wood from the new. If fall or winter pruning is attempted, there is always serious danger that the new wood will be cut out and the chances for heavy blossoming removed.

RASPBERRY CANE MANAGEMENT.—My blackberry and raspberry bushes are now three and four years old, and this year they seem to be making a very heavy growth of new wood. The canes are some of them four feet or more long. What shall I do with these canes? When should cutting back be done, or should it be done at all?
MRS. A. C. G. Mich.

A.—The new canes or shoots now growing so fast will bear next season's fruit, and they must be carefully handled as they are soft and tender and easily injured. By rights they should be pinched back—the end bud on each cane pinched off—while the canes are about two feet long. This makes the bushes more compact by stimulating the development of lateral shoots, reduces the danger from winter injury, and makes the bushes more productive. Keep pinching back the terminal buds until about the first of July, then stop. Pinching back after this date, as lateral branches produced late in the season seldom reach maturity, and are subject to winter injury. By going over the bushes once a week until July, they will be kept in good condition. Any canes that have grown too long either before the work is started, or after real hot weather arrives, should be left until next spring, then cut back to the desired height before before spring growth starts.

PREVENTING CABBAGE WORMS.—Please tell me the best and safest way to keep cabbage protected from worms and bugs. They cause damage in my garden every year. MRS. E. B. B., N. J.

A.—Use dry lead arsenic with equal amount of air-slaked lime, or dry calcium arsenate at the rate of one part calcium arsenate to three parts of lime. This may be applied in the kitchen garden with a small and inexpensive dusting machine. Where only a few plants are to be treated, any can such as a baking powder can, with holes poked in it, may be used like a salt shaker. Start dusting the plants when they are still quite small, and continue until the heads are well formed and solid, after which there is no danger of damage from cabbage worms.
